The same conditions with reference to the employment of foreigners which I have described as existing in the factories and in railroad and construction work prevail in the coal mines of Pennsylvania. In corroboration of this I wish to read a statement from the recent hearings of the House Committee on Immigration, based upon the report of the Immigration Commission, showing that something like 76 per cent, slightly more than three-fourths of the laborers in the bituminous coal mines of Pennsylvania, are of foreign birth. The statement is as follows:

Of the employees in the bituminous mines of Pennsylvania in 1909 only 15 per cent were native Americans or born of native father and 9 per cent native born of foreign father, while 76 per cent, or slightly more than three-fourths, were of foreign birth. What is more significant is that less than 8 per cent of the foreign-born mineworkers were English, Irish, Scotch, German, or Welsh. The majority were from southern or eastern Europe, with the Italians, Magyars, Poles, and Slovaks predominating. The term "American miner," so far as the western Pennsylvania field is concerned, is largely a misnomer. When they work these miners average, as in the case of the Roumanians, as low as $1.85 a day, while in the greater number of cases the range is close to $2; more than one-tenth of the Ruthenians, Roumanians, Poles, and Croatians earn on an average under $1.50 a day. But unemployment in the course of the year brings down the general average for heads of families to $431. The south Italians earn only $399 and the Poles $324.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to a table that will be found in volume 1 of the commission's report, page 412. It gives all the households studied by the commission the annual family income in this country. It gives the average amount and the range of the amount of the annual income of families. It shows the wage earnings in mines and manufacturing establishments; it gives the percentage earning under $300, the percentage of those earning under $500, under $750, under $1,000, and under $1,500 annually, and shows to what race the laborers belong. If the Senator desires to use that information, he will find it there.

Mr. SIMMONS. That very feature of this matter is discussed in one of the articles that I have called attention to before.

The average annual earnings of male heads of families employed in the industry—

That is, the Lawrence industry—are only $400, and of all males 18 years of age or over, $346.

Mr. President, think of $346 being the total yearly earnings of a male adult, many of whom have dependent upon them wife and children, and you have an idea of the manner in which they have to live.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just a moment I will yield.

Mr. Lauck, speaking about the standard of living in these factories, says:

The standards of living of the recent industrial workers—

And I am talking about them—from the south and east of Europe have also been very low. Furthermore, the recent immigrants being usually single or, if married, having left their wives abroad, have in large measure adopted a group instead of a family living arrangement, and thereby have reduced their cost of living to a point far below that of the American or of the older immigrant in the same industry.

Then he says:

Under this general method of living, which prevails among the greater proportion of the immigrant households, the entire outlay for necessary living expenses of each adult member ranges from $9 to $15 each month.

That is, from $2.25 to $3.75 a week.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The table giving the annual family income of the family studied by the commission, to which I referred a few moments ago, names every nationality, and gives the percentage of those who are earning less than $300 or less than $500, etc., but take the total native born, it appears that only 8.4 per cent of the whole of them are receiving under $300 a year; that there are only 33.2 per cent of them who are earning under $500 a year; and that there are about 66 per cent of them who fail to get up to $750 a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. What industry is the Senator speaking about?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am speaking about the annual income of families, the heads of which were wage earners in mines and manufacturing establishments, which are shown in this table. Those are the families studied by the commission, and the table gives the grand result of the foreign element.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator who was the chairman of the Immigration Commission if he thinks this influx of ignorant labor from the southern part of Europe is not depressing the wages of unskilled labor in this country? If he means to argue that it has not had that effect, I ask him how he accounts for the fact that the foreign laborers in the mines and bituminous-coal fields of Pennsylvania are receiving 42 cents a day less than native miners employed in the mines of the West and Southwest? And how does he explain the finding of the commission that the oversupply of unskilled labor brought about by excessive immigration has depressed wages in the basic industries of the country?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not argued. I simply read from the report of the commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. The commission found the hours of labor longer in these mines and the general working conditions poorer in Pennsylvania, and that the average wage of the bituminous-coal workers in Pennsylvania is 42 cents below the average wage of similar workers in the Middle West and Southwest.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not want to be put in the position of advocating any theory here. I have not broken into this debate for that purpose. The Senator from North Carolina was giving the figures in isolated cases. I called his attention——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I was not giving figures in isolated cases. I was giving the figures as applied to specific industries.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was calling attention to what we found to be the average wages received in each household, from all the households studied by the commission. Now, in answer to what the Senator said, let me say that I stand upon the report and I can not be driven from it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The commission found that the great mass of common labor coming into this country in the last 10 years has overstocked the market for common labor; that the great majority of that class of immigrants have gone into those sections of the country where the basic industries are carried on, like those which the Senator has mentioned, coal mining and other classes of mining, meat packing, and various other industries. We found that in many of those communities there were vastly more unmarried men who had come from the sections the Senator mentioned, largely from southeastern Europe, more than could be employed permanently, and that in many instances they would be employed four days in a week instead of six. The commission found that there was an overnumber of those who were classed among common laborers, and they thought it had a depressing influence, as the Senator has suggested, upon the labor market of the United States, and with the exception of one member of the commission they agreed that some method should be adopted to restrict that class of immigration. They recommended that the educational test was perhaps the most feasible method of cutting down the number who would come from those sections of the Old World and seek employment in the basic industries of this country.

Now, I am heartily in favor of the educational test for that particular reason, and because I have interrupted the Senator to give him figures which I thought were fair to state this case I would not want to have him think that I was in any way opposing the amendment which he has offered to this bill. I put this very matter in the bill when I drew it, and it was in the bill when it was introduced in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Vermont for some of his statements, showing that he stands by the report of the commission from which I have read so elaborately, and that he is in favor of the educational test as a means of meeting the evil of which I have complained and which I have attempted to point out. The only difference between the Senator and myself with respect to that is that I think the provision originally in the bill to accomplish that purpose ought to have been kept in the bill when reported here, and as it was stricken out I insist that it ought to be put in by amendment, and I hope the Senator will support that proposition.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I quite agree with the Senator, and I will say that I was not present at the meeting of the committee when it was decided to report against it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope, then, this amendment, in substance, will receive the support of the Senator when the bill comes up for action.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not read further, because I know I am trespassing upon the patience of the Senate. My only purpose in making this speech was to get the facts before the Senate and before the country, and not to indulge in any particular discussion of the facts but simply to state them.

I have here statements which I think show the same conditions, as I have described in connection with the industries discussed, exist in the iron and steel industry with respect to the employment of unskilled labor. It shows the per cent of foreigners who are engaged in that industry. The statement is by Mr. Brandeis, with reference to the Steel Corporation, and is based on a Senate document containing the report of the United States Bureau of Labor on the Bethlehem steel strike. Mr. Brandeis says:

Sixty-five per cent of the employees of the United States Steel Corporation in the Pittsburgh district earn less than the actual cost of subsistence of the average American family in Pittsburgh.

This calculation was made at the Steel Trust hearing by Louis D. Brandeis.

The average wage of 65 per cent of the employees of the steel corporation is 17½ cents an hour. The Associated Charities of Pittsburgh has computed the cost of bare existence of a family of a husband, a wife, and three children in that city at $768 a year. By working 12 hours a day, 365 days a year—

I am sorry to say in certain departments of the iron and steel industry they do work men 365 days a year; that is, 7 days a week and 12 hours a day. This fact was recently shown in the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee—

By working 12 hours a day, 365 days a year, 65 per cent of the steel-mill workers earn $1.50 less than the amount actually required as the bare cost of living.

Mr. President, in the face of this record, representatives of the wool and iron and steel industries at every opportunity come to Congress asking protection because of alleged difference between the cost of labor here and abroad. Especially do they want protection against German, English, French, and Belgian labor, and yet the unskilled labor they employ comes not from these European countries, but from that part of Europe where a much lower wage scale prevails. They not only come from countries of the lowest wage, but a large part of them represent the lowest wage earners of these low-wage countries.

The result is that the product of the factory is protected against foreign competition, while the labor which makes that product is unprotected not only against German labor and English labor, and so forth, but against the far cheaper labor of southern and eastern Europe.

Mr. President, I have here some statements taken from this work on immigration, by Profs. Jeremiah W. Jenks, of Cornell, and W. Jett Lauck, of Washington and Lee, giving the conclusions of those two eminent authorities, its authors, and the fundamental facts gathered by the Immigration Commission with respect to recent immigration, and which, I think, will be very interesting to the country and possibly might be of much interest to the Senate.

At the outset the authors say, as I have already indicated, that "they were associated with the commission from the beginning," and that it "has been their purpose" to put in shape for the public, in such a manner that its significance may be readily understood by the thoughtful reader, the gist of the information collected in the 42 volumes of original material published by the commission.

The writers say they are not advocates but interpreters of fact, and that such opinions as they have expressed in this volume are the result of careful deliberation after a study of the facts gathered by the commission.

ILLITERACY.

On page 34 of this book, speaking of illiteracy generally, there is a table showing the number and per cent of illiterates of each class of European immigration—that is, the old immigration and the new immigration—arriving in the fiscal years between 1899 and 1909, inclusive. Of the old immigration 2.7 per cent could not read and write, and of the new immigration 35 per cent could not read and write. The table is as follows:

Number and per cent of illiterates 14 years of age or over in each class of European immigration, including Syrian, in fiscal years 1899 to 1909, inclusive.

Class.	Total number 14 years or over.	Persons 14 years or over who do not read and write.
		Number.	Per cent.
Old immigration	1,983,618	52,833	2.7
New immigration	5,215,442	1,859,298	35.6
Total	7,199,060	1,912,131	38.3

Speaking of the more recent immigrant laborers and the "characteristics" of the present immigrant "labor supply" in this country the authors say, on page 170:

The recent immigrant laborers are marked by a high degree of illiteracy. More than two-fifths (44 per cent) could not read or write. The greatest illiteracy was exhibited by the south Italians, of whom one-half in the East and three-fifths in the South and West could not read in any language.

RACIAL DISPLACEMENT AS A RESULT OF IMMIGRANT COMPETITION.

Competition of the southern and eastern European has led to a voluntary or involuntary displacement in certain occupations and industries of the native American and of the older immigrant employees from Great Britain and northern Europe.

On page 184, with reference to "standards of living," they say:

The standards of living of the recent industrial workers from the south and east of Europe have also been very low. Furthermore, the recent immigrants, being usually single, or, if married, having left their wives abroad, have in large measure adopted a group instead of a family living arrangement, and thereby have reduced their cost of living to a point far below that of the American or of the older immigrant in the same industry.

LIVING EXPENSES.

Under this general method of living which prevails among the greater proportion of the immigrant households, the entire outlay for necessary living expenses of each adult member ranges from $9 to $15 each month.

LACK OF PERMANENT INTEREST.

With regard to their transient and migratory character, the following, from page 185, shows that the new immigration comes, as a rule, merely to pick up what it can find and carry it away:

Another salient characteristic of recent immigrants who have sought work in American industries has been that, as a whole, they have manifested but a small degree of permanent interest in their employment or in the industry. They have constituted a mobile, migratory, and disturbing wage-earning class, constrained mainly by their economic interest, and moving readily from place to place according to changes in working conditions or fluctuations in the demand for labor.

The effect of our too liberal immigration laws upon the efforts of organized labor to bring about better sanitation, reasonable hours, and other improved conditions of employment is pointed out on page 191 under the heading:

THE IMMIGRANT AND LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

The entrance into the operating forces of the mines and manufacturing establishments in such large numbers of the races of recent immigration has also had the effect of weakening the labor organizations of the original employees, and in some of the industries has caused their entire demoralization and disruption.

And there is one of a number of conclusions as to "The immigrant as a dynamic factor in industry" that I wish to quote, as follows, from page 195:

The conclusion of greatest significance developed by the general industrial investigation of the United States Immigration Commission is that the point of complete saturation has already been reached in the employment of recent immigrants in mining and manufacturing establishments. Owing to the rapid expansion in industry which has taken place during the past 30 years, and the constantly increasing employment of southern and eastern Europeans, it has been impossible to assimilate the newcomers, politically or socially, or to educate them to American standards of compensation, efficiency, or conditions of employment.

Throughout the entire field of the commission's inquiry, and in every phase of the question investigated, the mistake of longer allowing several hundred thousand adult illiterates to be brought here annually, in addition to the hundreds of thousands of literates that are injected every year into our labor supply, is made most clear and conclusive in this valuable work of Profs. Jenks and Lauck.

The last Congress created a Federal Bureau of Mines to see if something could not be done to check the ever-increasing number of mine accidents and explosions and other catastrophes that have been occurring with more and more frequency in the basic industries of the country. The investigations of the commission throw much light on one of the primary causes, if not the primary cause, of these awful losses of life that have been continually shocking the public. For it is into these basic industries that this new influx has gone and displaced the workers there whether they were native or foreign born. According to this book:

IMMIGRATION HAS PRODUCED UNSATISFACTORY CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT.

Relative to the effect of recent immigration upon native American and older immigrant wage earners in the United States, it may be stated, in the first place, that the lack of industrial training and experience of the recent immigrant before coming to the United States, together with his illiteracy and inability to speak English, has had the effect of exposing the original employees to unsafe and insanitary working conditions, or has led to the imposition of conditions of employment which the native American or older immigrant employees have considered unsatisfactory and in some cases unbearable. * * * There seems to be a direct causal relation between the extensive employment of recent immigrants in American mines and the extraordinary increase within recent years in the number of mining accidents.

It is effects of this kind, as well as the depressing effects upon wages and the standard of living, that has made organized labor appeal more and more each year for restrictive legislation.

And the investigations of the commission, according to this book, completely bear out the testimony of workingmen in the matter, for on pages 190 and 195 the authors say:

LOW STANDARD OF LIVING.

The extensive employment of recent immigrants has brought about living conditions and a standard of living with which the older employees have been unable or have found it extremely difficult to compete. This fact may be readily inferred from what has already been said relative to the methods of domestic economy of immigrant households and the cost of living of their members.

CHECKED INCREASE IN WAGES.

The low standards of the southern and eastern European, his ready acceptance of a low wage and existing working conditions, his lack of permanent interest in the occupation and community in which he has been employed, his attitude toward labor organizations, his slow progress toward assimilation, and his willingness seemingly to accept indefinitely without protest certain wages and conditions of employment have rendered it extremely difficult for the older classes of employees to secure improvements in conditions or advancement in wages since the arrival in considerable numbers of southern and eastern European wage earners.

FINAL CONCLUSION.

After considering the industrial effect of this recent immigration from every standpoint on pages 339 and 340 these distinguished authorities reach the conclusion that the effect is to lower the American standard of living and that some effective limitation of numbers is demanded, for they say:

The preceding chapters indicate, beyond possibility of contradiction, that tendencies toward lowering the American standard of living are at work at the present time in this country through our large immigration, and that therefore it is desirable that by some wisely effective method we restrict such immigration.

In this connection I want to read a statement made by John Mitchell, at one time head of the mine workers of the country, at present one of the vice presidents of the American Federation of Labor, and always a foremost and distinguished representative of labor, whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight and consideration.

Writing on this very question of immigration restriction in the Outlook one year ago last August he said:

The American workman recognizes the necessity of reasonable restrictions upon the admission of future immigrants; he realizes that his own welfare depends upon being able to work and to live in harmony and fellowship with those who have been admitted and are now a part of our industrial and social life.

The American wage earner, be he native or immigrant, entertains no prejudice against his fellow from other lands; but, as self-preservation is the first law of nature, our workmen believe and contend that their labor should be protected against the competition of an induced immigration comprised largely of men whose standards and ideals are lower than our own. The demand for the exclusion of Asiatics, especially the Chinese and the Hindus, is based solely upon the fact that as a race their standard of living is extremely low and their assimilation by Americans impossible. The American wage earner is not an advocate of the principle of indiscriminate exclusion which finds favor in some quarters, and he is not likely to become an advocate of such a policy unless he is driven to this extreme as a matter of self-preservation. He fails, however, to see the consistency of a legislative protective policy which does not, at the same time that it protects industry, give equal protection to American labor. If the products of our mills and factories are to be protected by a tariff on articles manufactured abroad, then, by the same token, labor should be protected against an unreasonable competition from a stimulated and excessive immigration. * * *

If we are going to regulate immigration at all we should prescribe by law definite conditions, the application of which would result in securing only those immigrants whose standards and ideals compare favorably with our own. To that end wage earners believe—

First. That, in addition to the restrictions imposed by the laws at present in force, the head tax of $4 now collected should be increased to $10.

Second. That each immigrant, unless he be a political refugee, should bring with him not less than $25, in addition to the amount required to pay transportation to the point where he expects to find employment.

Third. That immigrants between the ages of 14 and 50 years should be able to read a section of the Constitution of the United States, either in our language, in their own language, or in the language of the country from which they come.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I do not want to be understood in advocating an illiteracy test for the exclusion of immigrants as meaning that an unlettered man is necessarily and always an ignorant man in the sense of his not being intelligently informed in matters of general knowledge and that he is not under certain conditions a good citizen.

I know as a matter of fact, coming within my own knowledge and experience, that some of the best citizens of this country, certainly some of the best in my own State, some of the thriftiest, most honest, and, in a general way, most intelligent, are men who do not know a letter in the book. Speaking broadly, it is untrue than an American because he is unlettered is ignorant. Under our system, with our churches, our courts, our husting debates and speeches, the elimination of class distinction, bringing the unlettered man in constant contact with the educated element of his community, he may by contact and absorption become a well-informed and intelligent citizen, frequently of the highest thrift, with an intelligent understanding of the duties and responsibilities of sovereign citizenship.

But this is not true of the illiterates coming to us from southern and eastern Europe. They have enjoyed none of these advantages. They learn nothing of the genius of our institutions and life by contact and absorption. Their ignorance is dense They know nothing about freedom or its blessings or burdens. They know nothing about the responsibilities of citizenship in a self-governed country. They are unfit for citizens when they come, and they remain so.

It is this element who come here unfitted for citizenship who, after they get here, segregate themselves in the slums of the great cities or in colonies of our manufacturing and mining centers, who learn nothing by contact and make assimilation practically impossible, who are willing to live on less and work for less than the native American or old class of immigrants, who are unsettling the labor conditions of the country and making an advance in the conditions of unskilled labor as compared with that of skilled labor impossible, I would exclude.

In taking this position I do not mean to reflect upon the countries of their origin, because, beyond dispute, the class that I seek to exclude are not representative of the people of their own country. They are in the main undesirable there as well as they are undesirable here.

Mr. President, we have to have some standard to exclude this undesirable element. The standard of literacy is proposed as an appropriate device to this end, a device based on fundamental principles in the affairs of men and government.

I do not believe that anybody is interested in bringing this ignorant horde here except the great corporations, who want cheap labor, and oftentimes are indifferent as to where they get it, and the steamship companies, who want the profits accruing from their transportation, with little regard for the consequences to this country. These are largely responsible for their coming. Profit is the motive on their part for bringing them. The motives of the average immigrant of the nationalities I have referred to in coming here are not the motives which prompted the old immigrant settlers.

They came, Mr. President, largely to escape political and religious persecution in their own countries; they came in search of the higher liberty of our republican institutions; they brought their families, and came to make this land their home. We did not shut our doors to them; and to this class of men, who come here for those purposes, men who come here because they have a longing to secure the advantages and opportunities of an enlarged individual liberty, we shall not shut our doors; but, Mr. President, a large part of those who are coming here now come for no such purpose. They come in the main to make a stake and carry it away; and in coming they inject into our citizenship an element which tends to lower it economically and socially, and which tends to disturb and unsettle not only the social and political but especially the economic conditions of the country. Only a small per cent of those representing these nationalities ever become naturalized. Many of them come with the fixed purpose of soon returning to their old homes. They are brought here for the purpose of competition with American labor, and the competition which follows is a ruinous competition that tends to undermine the wage and living conditions of our labor here whether native or foreign born, and to prevent wonted betterment in their conditions.

In what I have said I have confined myself largely to the discussion of the economic aspects of our immigration problem, because it is largely economic considerations that have stimulated the present influx, and it is in this direction that the evil is now most acute, as conclusively shown by the commission's report. There is a political and social aspect of this question which I would like to discuss, but I do not feel that I can trespass so long upon the patience of the Senate.

Mr. President, in final conclusion I trust that the amendment which I have offered, buttressed as it is by a powerful public sentiment and by practically the unanimous verdict and finding of the Immigration Commission, will, when that bill is taken up for consideration, receive the indorsement of the Senate.

During the delivery of Mr. SIMMONS's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on the request of the Senator from North Dakota, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

At the conclusion of Mr. SIMMONS's speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it has not been my privilege to hear the entire speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I was interested in his discussion of the immigration question, and I have very great sympathy with the position the Senator takes, as the Senator knows from conversation with me, and I shall be glad, indeed, to cooperate with the Senator in bring about better laws and a better condition in all parts of the country.

I regret, however, that in his speech the Senator thought it was necessary to revive the discussion about the condition of things in the industrial centers of New England, particularly in the city of Lawrence, and that he, I think somewhat inadvertently, perhaps, introduced the tariff question into the debate. I do not propose to say a word about the tariff at the present time; that is a question that we probably shall have up for discussion in the near future, and then we can all express our views, and I apprehend they will be very diverse views when we come to the consideration of that very important subject; but I do want, Mr. President, to enter something of a protest against the picture the Senator has drawn of New England industrial towns and cities.

The wage paid in the city of Lawrence to operatives in the textile mills is larger than the wage paid in the city of Washington to common laborers. The wage paid in those mills, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has very properly stated, is larger than the wage paid in the great department stores of this city and of every other city in this country.

I am not going to occupy the attention of the Senate, but I want to ask permission, Mr. President—the Senator from North Carolina has put in a great mass of matter without reading—to introduce a statement from the Citizens' Association of Lawrence, Mass., touching the condition of things in that much-discussed city. I shall only read two paragraphs from this interesting statement, and then ask permission to insert the remainder of it. The Citizens' Association says:

In the savings banks of Lawrence alone, which are mainly patronized by the mill operatives, there are $20,000,000 on deposit. The cooperative savings banks have several millions more.

One-quarter of the real estate of Lawrence is owned by mill operatives or former mill operatives, and the valuation of the real estate of Lawrence is well up beyond the $53,000,000 mark.

After reading those two paragraphs, I ask permission to insert the entire statement in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

LAWRENCE AS IT REALLY IS—NOT AS SYNDICALISTS, ANARCHISTS, SOCIALISTS, SUFFRAGISTS, PSEUDO PHILANTHROPISTS, AND MUCKRAKING YELLOW JOURNALISTS HAVE PAINTED IT.

LAWRENCE, March.

The average citizen of this typical Massachusetts industrial city doesn't really know yet whether to get mad with the average citizen of all the other American cities or laugh at him for the absurd conceptions he has formed during the past six weeks of Lawrence. One moment the average Lawrencian is ready to groan aloud at the ease with which so many of his fellow citizens, in spite of all the advantages they enjoy of free education, a free press, free speech, etc., can be duped into believing the most outrageous imaginings of any gang of clever schemers. The next moment he is almost ready to double up with laughter as he looks in that mirror of fleeting time, the daily press, and sees what a misshapen thing has been labeled Lawrence.

Possibly it will be even more of a caricature when the monthly magazines have solemnly gone over the rubbish heap of the daily press imaginings and added a few of their own special brands of darkness.

But it is, after all, something more than a laughing matter for Lawrence, as it is almost certainly something than concerns not only Lawrence and Massachusetts but every American city.

Consider what really happened in Lawrence, and then consider what the great American public was made to believe happened there and that it is still being made to believe is happening there.

The morning after January 12 of this year the good people of Lawrence woke up—that is, those of them who had kept informed of what had been going on in certain cities of France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Russia during the past decade—to the fact that a syndicalist strike had been started in their city.

It started in with all the usual accompaniments of a full-fledged syndicalist strike. There was the sudden desertion of their work by several hundred employees of the Washington mill early in the morning of January 12 and the immediate cutting of the belts that connected the various pieces of machinery with the power plant, the breaking of machinery, the flourishing of knives and revolvers, with threats to kill the overseers if they interfered, and the ordering of women and girls to join in the strike under penalty of immediate wounding and killing—all strictly syndicalistic.

This irruption of the employees in one of the departments resulted in practically all the help in that department rushing out of the mill, some because they had planned the strike and many others through a panic fear that the wild actions of the leaders and the sight of drawn stilettos and revolvers inspired.

When outside the Washington, the strikers rushed across the river to the Wood mill, pushed aside the gateman, and hurried, yelling madly and still flourishing daggers and revolvers, through the rooms of this mill, calling upon all to join a strike that up to that moment few of those at work in that mill had the slightest inkling of. Here, too, belts were cut, valuable warps of yarn destroyed, and motors attached to looms put out of commission. An attempt was also made here to reach and wreck the great power plant of this big mill, which was on that day giving employment to 6,600 persons.

In some of the rooms reached by this mob from the other mill the overseers, seeing what unreasonable and dangerously excited people they had to deal with, and to prevent their being assaulted, suggested to their employees that they stop work and quietly leave the mill. This was done, with the result that thousands were soon out in the street that runs between the Wood and Ayer mills. The leaders of the strike then turned their attention to the Ayer mill. They forced a massive gate off its hinges and managed to get into some of the rooms of that mill, creating the same sort of panic as in the other mills visited. Some joined them from this mill, but not many.

They soon came out of it and headed back to the north side of the river, where they had started from. When they reached the Duck mill—the other three mills visited belong to the American Woolen Co.—the mob, then about 1,200 strong, tried to break in through the big gates of that mill But the gates withstood their efforts. Here a small force of police made a determined stand.

This force of police bravely faced all these strikers, who were now worked up to a dangerous pitch by the leaders of the movement, many of whom did not work in any mill but had been waiting for just such an outbreak to join it.

Ice, snowballs, sticks of wood, and any kind of missiles that came to hand were hurled through the windows of this mill at the operatives who could be seen at work. After keeping up this sort of thing for half an hour or so, taunting the policemen, who only numbered a round dozen, a rush was made at the little band of representatives of law and order. They withstood it bravely and, laying about vigorously with their clubs, drove this big mob of men, many of them armed with knives, stilettos, and revolvers, up the street and into their own quarter of the city.

That all happened during the forenoon of the 12th. It was so sudden, no notice of any kind from the regular organization of workers having been given to the mill owners of any intention to strike, that even after this ominous raising of the head of sabotage—or "giving the boot," as the French syndicalists say in defining the strike a revolutionary, anarchistic, and destructive kind—that few in Lawrence thought it would amount to much more than ordinary strikes of the past wherein an organized body of workers present in an orderly manner their demands, and then representatives from both sides, after the usual amount of bargaining, reach a settlement satisfactory to both sides.

But the following morning, with its spread of the strike to other mills and the announcement that on Sunday one Ettor, national organizer of the Industrial Workers of the World, an organization that few in Lawrence had ever heard of before, would be in Lawrence, lifted the veil for even the dullest. Sunday came and with it a meeting in the city hall, at which Joseph Ettor, direct from Brooklyn, was present. He made a fiery address, in the course of which the city government, the State government, and the National Government were denounced as enemies of the workingmen, fit only to be wiped out of existence, along with capitalism, religion of all kinds, authority of all kinds.

In a word, he avowed himself an advocate of the doctrine of "direct action," of violence, as a believer in the philosophy of force, for he proclaimed time and again, apparently trying to drill it into the brain fiber of his hearers, that "he who has force on his side has the law on his side." He also advocated destroying the machinery of employers who did not grant all the demands of the strikers.

This is the man who took charge of the strike in Lawrence the third day after its inception. He had a personality that was winning in its way. He spoke English and Italian fluently. He soon had all the active spirits in the strike believing in him absolutely and ready to do his slightest bidding.

From his entrance upon the scene terrorism of an undefined, widespread, all-pervasive kind spread throughout the city. In a few days more than 20,000 operatives were out of work, most of them through sheer fear of the knives and revolvers flourished by so many of the strikers and from fear inspired by the sinister reports industriously circulated of what happened to "scabs."

As a large proportion of the mill operatives in Lawrence, like in all textile cities, are girls from 15 years of age up and women, it is easy to understand how effective such a reign of terror would be in keeping them out of the mills.

Picket lines were stretched all around the mill district by the strikers, and every one that passed them on the way to work in the morning had to bear the brunt of scowling looks, opprobrious epithets, and the threats, "I will kill you."

In the course of that second week hundreds of windows were broken in the mills and thousands of dollars' worth of valuable calico printing plates were ruined by drawing files across the etched copper rolls.

The situation became so threatening, with a great mob of 5,000 or more non-English-speaking people parading where they pleased around the city, that the local companies of the State militia were called out to help the police to preserve order.

The Monday morning beginning the third week of the strike the most serious rioting occurred. Every street car in that city that was bearing workers to the mills was stoned, the windows broken, the passengers driven out, their lunch boxes taken away from them, and their clothes torn from their backs. Fully 5,000 persons were concerned in the attack on the street cars all over the city. It was evidently a concerted move, one deliberately planned to add to the terror of the inhabitants of the city, and to be looked upon as a step toward even more serious breaches of the liberties of the peaceable inhabitants unless the demands of the strike leaders were granted.

The governor's representative was in the city and saw what had occurred. When he returned to the statehouse in Boston his advice was the same as that of the civic rulers and the leading citizens of Lawrence—that a large additional force of militia was needed in Lawrence at once.

It was hurried here that very night, and by noon of the next day there were nearly 2,200 militiamen in Lawrence, including two troops of the State Cavalry.

Quiet reigned in Lawrence thenceforth. With the exception of a woman, who was shot by a rioter who aimed at a policeman, and a young Syrian, who was accidentally bayoneted by a militiaman, there were no deaths as a result of the strike, which at its height kept 25,000 persons out of work, many of whom could not understand a word of English and to most of whom English was not the language of their native land.

This meager death list must look startlingly small to the readers of the sensational press, even to the readers of the fairly conservative daily press, outside Lawrence.

The papers were so monopolized day after day, especially around New England and New York, with great headlines blazoning forth some supposedly sensational fact regarding the great strike in Lawrence that unconsciously most of the readers of the daily press outside of Lawrence imbibed the idea that it was a city whose streets had been bathed in the blood of hundreds of strikers slaughtered by a ruthless capital-controlled militia. The very name of Lawrence conjured up in their minds a vision of a beleaguered city ringed round by the gleaming bayonets of soldiers—one in which death stalked every minute and where gaunt skeletons of men, women, and children strikers besieged soup kitchens for the scanty dole of sympathizing contributors to their cause.

Why is it and how is it that the reality is so far different from that pictured for the benefit of newspaper readers all over the country?

There are many reasons for it. The main reasons, however, are few but interesting. The chief reason is not only interesting, but highly significant and pregnant with issues more vital and far-reaching in their consequences to the country at large than even a half hundred strikes as great as that in Lawrence.

Among the main reasons for hitting up the Lawrence strike in a sensational way is the common one which makes politics the bane of the country on so many occasions. It is a presidential year, and the tariff could be hammered.

Another main reason for the strike in Lawrence being kept on the first page of the newspapers so long and getting scare heads so constantly is the growth during the past few years of that form of newspaper that caters to the neuresthenic or hysterical, which sees only the unusual, the extraordinary, and where the unusual and the extraordinary do not exist proceeds straightway to invent them.

To such newspapers, with their screaming headlines and their lack of the sense of proportion the Lawrence strike, with its militia on guard, its cosmopolitan strikers, about every nation in Europe being represented, besides a few of the nations of Asia, was a veritable treasure trove. They could "play it up" to the limit. And they did.

One of them is even suspected of having foreknowledge of the plot to "plant" a lot of dynamite with the idea of further terrorizing the city. It had startling stories of dynamite plots to blow up all the mill buildings, the city buildings, the homes of the governor of the State and of Col. Sweetser of the militia for several successive days before the "planted" dynamite was found by the police just where it had been left.

And when that carefully "planted" dynamite was found what a shiver went through the country as the wild-eyed yellow journals in all the big cities covered their front pages with great headlines about enough dynamite being found to blow the entire city of Lawrence off the map. One New York paper even went to the extent of having the Lawrence city hall and other public buildings blown up by dynamite and 50 persons killed. When one youth was slightly wounded by the bayonet of a militiaman, another New York paper had a picture made and run on its first page showing a group of savage-looking soldiers shoving their bayonets through a lot of women who were lying on the street, which was strewn with other women and children, who had presumably just been killed by the same soldiers or their comrades. Such was the imaginary rot that a free and untrammeled American press fed out day after day to the intelligent public of our leading American cities.

But these hysterical newspapers, even those of them that are deliberately engaged in exploiting the gullibility of the American public, were not the main cause of the widespread, persistent, and diabolically clever way in which the Lawrence strike was kept before the public all over the country, and in a manner calculated to prejudice the public, not only against the mill owners and city authorities of Lawrence, but against our State and National Governments, and against any government or any regularly instituted authority.

That was done and made possible by the fact that the "direct action" socialists, the believers, like Ettor and Haywood, in the doctrine of force, the syndicalists, are able to exert an overwhelming directing force on the Socialist Party as it exists to-day in this country.

They have hoodwinked the older, theorizing, peace-loving socialists. They pull the wires now. Therefore, every move they made in Lawrence calculated to advance the cause of opposition to the present form of society, calculated to lead to its overthrow, was heralded in every city in the Union where they control the socialistic societies as a great step taken toward breaking the "slave's chains," that, according to them, still bind the American workingman. Simultaneously various socialistic and anarchistic societies in Boston, New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and dozens of smaller cities would send resolutions to the leading officials in their cities and States and their representatives in Congress and to the newspapers, calling attention to some new alleged atrocity committed in Lawrence by the police or the militia or capitalists, and demanding immediate action, either in the way of denunciation or an investigation by Congress.

In the same way newspapers all over the country received letters demanding that Ettor and Haywood be indorsed, that the Lawrence mill owners be denounced, and something done toward dividing up the property of the country among the "proletariat," the favorite word of the socialists. The strikers in the Lawrence mills who had only been in the country six months or less were among the most ardent advocates of Ettor's ideas regarding a division of the wealth of the country.

The fellow feeling that makes us wondrous kind was in evidence in Lawrence constantly as soon as the strike had become a full-blown and sensational one of the violently syndicalist type. Shoals of the theorizing socialists from the pseudophilanthropic societies of New York, those under salary especially, writers of modern studies of the unclean, absinthe-drinking frequenters of the imitation cabarets of New York, those Bohemian writers, whose fate it is, according to Brunetiere, to foolishly idle away their youth and wake up to find that they have an old age of poverty and ill health before them, paid investigators for faddist hunting rich men of New York came on, looked over the ground for half an hour, and declared that the syndicalists were everlastingly right and everyone else everlastingly wrong in their ideas of the proper way in which to run society.

But in all the great sea of ink spread over the miles of paper printed about the Lawrence strike, in the midst of all the vast volume of fakes, of panegyrics of Ettor, Haywood, and other leaders from out of the city, there was seldom a word of sympathy for the strikers of workers who were marching gallantly to work morning after morning in the face of threats, assaults, curses, tearing of clothes, throwing of pepper in their eyes, stoning of their homes when they happened to live in any sparsely settled portion of the city. Not a word for those thousands of breadwinners, women many of them, widows some of them, who, not having gone on strike, not having belonged to any union, not believing in the revolutionary and violent doctrines preached by the Industrial Workers of the World, felt that they still lived in a free country and had a right to work if they wanted to.

If it had not been for the militia, they would not have dared to go to work, for they certainly would have been murdered, if the temper shown by the rioters before the militia was strengthened was given free rein by the opportunity a lack of police and militia would have afforded.

Yet one will search the papers of the big cities that gave a large amount of space to the Lawrence strike in vain for any kindly reference to these workers who returned in increasing numbers to their work every day when it was shown that the murderous mob spirit was held in leash by the display of military and police force.

Terrorism was the strongest weapon that the Industrial Workers of the World used in Lawrence. When it was partially taken from their grasp and the reign of ordered liberty restored, their strength waned rapidly. And only as that terror survived, nursed and cultivated by the methods of the Black Hand and the Mafia did any of the strength of the syndicalist strike survive.

It should be understood, though, that Lawrence people as a whole, clergymen, business men, professional men; in fact, all classes, were heartily in sympathy with the attempts of the mill workers to get an increase in wages. They were, in fact, solidly with them until they saw the dangerously destructive and subversive nature of the society that had assumed charge of the strike.

They would have nothing to do with it any more than any men in any city will have anything to do with it if they believe in the opposite to anarchy. But they did not desert the cause of the mill operatives.

They gave practical aid to those among them who were in need of aid. And they labored steadily to secure for them some advance in wages from the mill managers, in which they were successful, as on March 1 practically all the mills in Lawrence, ignoring completely the Industrial Workers of the World, granted an increase in wages ranging from 5 per cent upward.

When those outside of Massachusetts understand that the mills of this State, under a law passed last year, may work only 54 hours a week, while the same kind of mills in New Hampshire and other States may work 58 hours a week, and in New York and some other States 60 hours a week, running exactly the same kind of machinery, the handicap which Massachusetts mills labor under when there is no national labor law may be easily understood.

Not only is Lawrence not a blood-soaked city, or a dynamite-riddled city, but it is not a bankrupt city and not a city of working people without bank accounts.

A United States Senator—POINDEXTER—in discussing Lawrence in the National Capital the other day, said he could not see how the people of Lawrence could have any bank accounts on an average wage of $6 a week. Well, they do not have bank accounts on $6 a week, which he said was the average wages paid in the mills of Lawrence. Their average pay is much higher, being for all the mill workers, including women and minors and excluding the salaried men in the mills, $9.20 a week. The average yearly income of the workingman the country over is, according to Congressman BERGER, Socialist, $476. The average yearly income of the mill operatives of Lawrence, according to the United States census of 1910, is $478.40, so that it is slightly higher than the average wages the country over.

In the saving banks of Lawrence alone, which are mainly patronized by the mill operatives, there are $20,000,000 on deposit. The cooperative savings banks have several millions more.

One quarter of the real estate of Lawrence is owned by mill operatives or former mill operatives, and the valuation of the real estate of Lawrence is well up beyond the $53,000,000 mark.

There is no brighter looking, more up-to-date looking industrial city in the country than Lawrence with its 85,000 people. In the last 10-year period it made a 37 per cent gain in population. Perhaps it gained too rapidly. Perhaps there wasn't time for a proper assimilation of the newcomers from Europe. Perhaps the mills are to blame for encouraging too rapid an influx of people from parts of Europe and Asia Minor where there has been no chance to acquire skill that will be helpful in the textile industries, with the consequent result that they have to glut the labor market with unskilled and consequently poorly paid labor.

But, perchance, the steamship companies have done more than they ought in stimulating immigration. In either case the Immigration Bureau should take notice.

But Lawrence was as prosperous, progressive, and contented as any manufacturing city in the United States until the syndicalists tried to give birth to a new social era by a cataclysm to be started in Lawrence. Its churches, schools, its clergymen and professional men, its business men and workingmen were doing as good work as in any other city of its kind, and are now as ready and eager to go ahead and do more and better work.

It should also be remembered that the many races now in Lawrence are just as capable of furnishing good material for American citizenship as the many different races in any American city in the country. Those of them who fell in with the schemes of the syndicalists are simply the victims of misplaced confidence. They can be taught better.

CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION, LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Turning, Mr. President, to the report of the Tariff Board—and some of us have a good deal of confidence in that report; it was made by a nonpartisan board, containing, I think, nearly as many Democrats as there are Republicans, if I remember correctly—turning to the report of that board, volume 3, page 824, I find a "comparative statement of highest and lowest weekly wages paid in specified occupations in the Philadelphia, Providence, and Lawrence districts"—three cities where the textile industry is perhaps the leading industry. I find that in Lawrence the wages were a little higher than in either Providence or Philadelphia. They range from one item, which is for children, $5 a week to $75 for men engaged in the business of dyeing. They are paid from $40 to $75 a week. The ordinary laborers—men, woman, and children combined—receive on an average from $8 to $11 and $12 a week. I ask that that paper, which is an official paper, be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER. Again turning to the report of the Tariff Commission, volume 3, page 826, I find a comparative table as to the wages paid in Great Britain in the woolen and worsted industry and in this country. This table shows that we in this country are paying in this much-maligned industry, in some instances, as high as 184 per cent more than is being paid in Great Britain; in many instances 75 per cent, and in others 106 per cent and 117 per cent, and so on down the line. We are paying, I should judge, without having made an accurate computation, at least twice as much, and in all human probability a little more than twice as much, in similar industries in this country in the woolen manufacture as is being paid by one of our leading competitors, the Empire of Great Britain. I ask that that statement may also be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I will not weary the Senate further, but simply repeat my suggestion of regret that this matter has been brought into the discussion of a subject in which I am greatly interested and regarding which I will cooperate gladly, to the extent of my ability, with the Senator from North Carolina.

POLITICAL CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to dispose of two matters which are on the table. It will take but a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CULBERSON. For a question; yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The unfinished business was laid aside in order that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] might finish his address, with the idea of taking it up immediately thereafter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the matters I have in mind will take but a moment. I want to dispose finally of two matters which are on the table, neither of which will provoke discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the order which is on page 17 of the calendar, proposing to discharge the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate from the further consideration of Senate resolution 79, be indefinitely postponed, that resolution having since been reported and adopted in part by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order referred to will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask now that Senate bill 3315, which was introduced by me December 5, 1911, and which is on page 17 of the calendar as one of the subjects on the table, be printed in full in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where resolution No. 79 is now pending, they relating to the same general subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3315) to prohibit corporations from making contributions in connection with political elections and to limit the amount of such contributions by individuals or persons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objecton to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any national bank, or any other corporation organized by authority of a law of the United States, to contribute any money or other thing of value in connection with any election to any political office. It shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to contribute any money or other thing of value in connection with any election at which electors for President and Vice President of the United States, or a Representative in the Congress of the United States, are to be voted for, or any election by any State legislature of a Senator of the United States. Every corporation which shall make any contribution in violation of this section shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and every officer, director, or agent who shall consent to any contribution by the corporation in violation of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $250 and not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any individual or person to contribute money or other thing of value exceeding in value $5,000 in connection with any election at which electors for President and Vice President of the United States or a Representative in the Congress of the United States are to be voted for, or any election by any State legislature of a Senator of the United States: Provided, That this section shall not apply to individuals or persons who at such an election are candidates for President, Vice President, Representative, or Senator. Every individual or person who shall make any contribution in violation of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000 nor more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, that bill seeks to amend and enlarge the act approved January 26, 1907, relating to campaign contributions by corporations, which I will ask to be inserted also in the RECORD. It is quite brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

CHAP. 420.—An act to prohibit corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any laws of Congress, to make a money contribution in connection with any election to any political office. It shall also be unlawful for any corporation whatever to make a money contribution in connection with any election at which presidential and vice presidential electors or a Representative in Congress is to be voted for or any election by any State legislature of a United States Senator. Every corporation which shall make any contribution in violation of the foregoing provisions shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000, and every officer or director of any corporation who shall consent to any contribution by the corporation in violation of the foregoing provisions shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 and not less than $250, or by imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

Approved, January 26, 1907.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in this connection I will take advantage of the opportunity to read a paragraph from the Democratic national platform of 1908, which, I think, will address itself to all patriotic Members of the Senate, and that includes all here, particularly the Democratic Members:

We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing any amount above a reasonable maximium, and providing for the publication, before election, of all such contributions above a reasonable maximum.

I see smiles across the Chamber, and I will add that I read that especially to suggest that the Democratic Party is pledged to a law limiting the amount which individuals may contribute, that party already having forced upon the national administration the publication of campaign funds before election, as well as a prohibition against money contributions by corporations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator indicate what would be a reasonable amount?

Mr. GALLINGER. A reasonable maximium.

Mr. McCUMBER. A reasonable maximum for a contribution to the Democratic campaign?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have named $5,000 in the bill. The largest single amount contributed in 1908 to the Democratic campaign fund was $5,000 by former Senator Charles J. Hughes. I assume that that is a reasonable maximum, and have so fixed it in my bill, against $110,000, the maximum contributed to the Republican campaign fund in the same year by an individual.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator make any distinction in the character of the two causes?

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not catch the remark of the Senator. It must have been a good one.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, unless my memory is greatly at fault, there was published a report during the last presidential campaign that Mr. Herman Ridder, the treasurer of the Democratic national committee, and his brothers contributed something like $35,000 or $40,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. That was largely in labor in connection with printing in a newspaper owned by the Ridders, father and sons. The largest amount, I repeat, contributed to the Republican campaign fund by a single individual in 1908 was $110,000, and $5,000 to the Democratic fund.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Ridder contributed in goods, not money.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

PUBLIC-BUILDING BILLS.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit the unfinished business to be laid aside, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider three bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be considered as laid aside.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, on Saturday last the Senate passed a number of bills on the calendar, among others several providing for the construction of public buildings. I desire now to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 317) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sundance, in the State of Wyoming; the bill (S. 4493) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Thermopolis, in the State of Wyoming; and the bill (S. 318) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Newcastle, Wyo., were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I also ask that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bills to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not ask for the present consideration of his motion, but simply enters the motion.

Mr. LEA. I simply enter the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered; and, in the absence of objection, the motion to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bills named by the Senator will be considered as agreed to.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not aware that any Senator desires to speak on the general pension bill to-day. It, however, has been upon the calendar for some weeks, and we are not gaining a great deal of headway with it. I assume, therefore, that the Senate, at least, is agreeable to fixing a date on which we may vote on the measure. I would suggest that we vote on Friday of this week; but some Senators have stated that they possibly would be away until Saturday, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who is quite anxious to be present when the vote is taken on the bill, indicated that he might possibly be away over Saturday. Because of that, Mr. President, and the desire to dispose of this measure before we get so much other business before the Senate that our calendar becomes congested, I ask unanimous consent that on the next day succeeding the legislative day on which the vote is taken upon the Stephenson resolution, immediately after the morning business on that day, we proceed to the consideration of the general pension bill, and that a vote be taken upon it and all amendments not later than 4 o'clock on that day.

Mr. SIMMONS. What day did the Senator suggest?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would be the next legislative day after the vote is taken upon the Stephenson resolution. That resolution is set for next Monday—a week from to-day—but the vote is to be taken on that legislative day, and there may be two or three calendar days of recess before the legislative day is over.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator suggests the next day after that matter is disposed of?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have taken no part in the discussion of the proposed pension legislation and may not do so, but, in view of the meager attendance, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McCUMBER. We are ready to go on, then, I presume, with the bill this afternoon, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which, without objection, the Secretary will again state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 3 and in lieu thereof to insert section 6, as printed in the House bill, so that if amended section 3 will read:

SEC. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to modify the amendment by adding the words——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the business the Senator has in hand. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to modify the amendment by adding the words "except in original applications."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies the amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the section the words "except in original applications."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment as modified read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment in full.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 3 as reported by the committee, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions, or securing any pension under this act, except in original applications.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I address myself especially to the Senator from New Hampshire. Does he understand that the exception applies to original claims under this proposed act?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under this proposed act; yes. I understand that in all cases where we have had legislation of this kind there are some soldiers who had not previously made application, but, in view of the fact that the pension perhaps is larger than under the former laws, they have filed original applications, on age, for instance, or on service, and they are to be given the right of employing pension attorneys.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Would not all applications under this bill be treated as original applications?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should not think so, but perhaps the phraseology might be "except in applications for original pension." I will change it in that manner.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask a question. Am I to understand, then, that fees would only be allowed in applications which were made by pensioners who have not heretofore drawn a pension?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is my purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. If that is the construction to be placed upon the amendment I certainly approve it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as last modified.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask to have the amendment as now modified stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 3, as reported by the Committee on Pensions, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions, or securing any pension under this act, except in applications for original pension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That becomes the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not wish to vote upon this question until at least the reasons which guided the majority of the committee in arriving at their conclusion in favor of allowing attorneys' fees are given to the Senate.

I understand, although indirectly, that the Commissioner of Pensions also advises in favor of this amendment. The amendment is carefully guarded; I think it is $2 and $5; and there is no lien upon the papers or any claim of that character.

There are a great many cases in which it is almost necessary to employ an attorney. Such cases arise mostly on the question of age. It often requires a great deal of correspondence between the soldier, or some one acting for him, and the department in order to get matters straightened out. We have at least one scale of ages that is different from that in the act of 1907, and undoubtedly there will be quite a few cases other than those in which pensions have already been granted in which there will be considerable correspondence concerning the age.

Many of the soldiers enlisted under ages that were not their true ages. Many of them, in order to get into the service, when enlisted gave a date of birth which would make them older than they really were, and there will necessarily arise questions as to the age of the soldier when he enlisted.

Then, again, quite a number of soldiers enlisted under assumed names, not always under their own names, but under an alias, and considerable difficulty will arise in that class of cases. A little payment of $2 probably would not be a terrible imposition upon a soldier who might receive under the bill from $15 to $30 a month for the balance of his life; and I confess—whatever view the Senate may take of the question, and I shall myself be satisfied with whatever the decision of the Senate may be—that I am not ready to regard the great army of Union veterans as children, imbeciles, or in their dotage. I think they are able to take care of themselves, and should be allowed to ask an attorney to act for them if they see fit to do so.

There is no law compelling them to employ an attorney. It is simply a recognition of attorneys who may be employed by soldiers in cases in which appeals would have to be taken and in other cases of the character I have stated.

The majority of the committee felt that with these two meager sums of $2 and $5 to pay for postage stamps and the correspondence no one probably would be liable to get rich off the soldiers, and I do not think those who have already established their ages—although letters may be sent to them by the thousands, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire—will feel themselves compelled to answer every letter or compelled to employ an attorney simply because one of them sent him his card and stated that he would be glad to be employed by the soldier.

My view is that the soldier should be regarded as an intelligent American citizen and be permitted to do as he pleased about employing an attorney; and if in any given case the question of age or enlistment or length of service became an issue, that he could employ an attorney and have him carry on the correspondence for him and could incur a liability of $2. I hardly think it is necessary for the Senate to consider itself his guardian to the extent that it shall say to him that he shall not have the privilege of expending $2 out of his pension in any way he sees fit. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Applause in the galleries is not permitted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota is aware of the fact that this is not an original proposition. It is found in other similar laws. I chanced to be chairman of the Committee on Pensions for quite a number of years, and the soldiers every since have been writing me very freely, many of them being under the impression that I am still occupying that exalted position, and I have never received a complaint from a soldier that any harm came to him because of the fact that we have had this inhibition in former laws.

The Senator from North Dakota wants the soldiers treated as intelligent men. That is precisely what this amendment proposes to accomplish, and we believe they are intelligent enough to know that they do not need the services of an attorney to determine their ages or their names when the names and the ages are on record at the Pension Office at the present time.

Mr. McCUMBER. But suppose the wrong age was given?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota further says that the Commissioner of Pensions recommends this amendment. That is not in accordance with my view. The Commissioner of Pensions, if I may be permitted to quote him, says it is immaterial to him whether it is in or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think the Senator quite understood me, or he would not have made that statement. I said that I understood indirectly that the commissioner regarded it in a favorable light.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand directly that the commissioner says these cases can be adjudicated in the office, and it is immaterial to him whether this provision is in or not; that he is the servant of Congress to administer the law. And I know, inasmuch as other laws have been administered by the Pension Bureau without the employment of attorneys by the soldiers, that this law can be administered in the same way.

I know, and other Senators know, that the moment this bill passes, with the provision for the employment of pension attorneys, every soldier will receive from 1 to 10 letters in the next mail; they are prepared now, without a doubt; and the soldiers will naturally say, "This attorney thinks it is necessary for me to employ an attorney; it is only $5; and I will employ him." The soldier will write the attorney, and he will come under obligations to employ him. I think we ought to stop that practice when it is not necessary.

Pension attorneys—and some of them are my friends, and they have called on me recently—have reaped a rich reward from our pension legislation, and now that we are simply proposing automatically to increase the pension of those who are on the rolls, we ought not to open the gates again to the pension attorneys of this country.

The modification I suggested to my original amendment was suggested to me by a gentleman who said there would be a few original applications. I am inclined to think the phraseology I used, writing at my desk, is not quite comprehensive enough, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has suggested to me that he will offer an amendment which will make it a little bit more specific. In some cases attorneys ought to be permitted to be employed. If the soldier has not made application under any other law, we ought not to shut him out from the employment of an agent or an attorney; and am I quite willing, in fact desirous, that that class of soliders shall have that privilege. But, notwithstanding the appeal that has come to me, from potential quarters, from friends very close to me, to let this legislation go as the committee reported it, I am compelled to protest against it, because I think it is our duty to protect the soldier, even to the extent of $2, when we grant him a pension; and when it is not necessary, we should not permit him to expend it on pension attorneys.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire provides in substance that no attorneys' fees shall be allowed except in applications for original pensions. It seems to me that that might be open to one of two possible constructions; that is, it might refer to an original application under this particular bill or it might mean in cases of original applications by persons who have not heretofore drawn a pension.

As I understand the Senator from New Hampshire, it was his idea to permit the payment of attorneys' fees only in those cases where there was an original application by one who has not heretofore drawn a pension. To that end I offer the following exception instead of the one contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire:

Except in applications for original pensions by persons who have not heretofore received a pension.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire, the Chair understands, accepts that modification?

Mr. GALLINGER. I accept it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a moment ago I objected to a proposal made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to agree unanimously that a vote be taken on this measure on the legislative day following the 25th instant. After stating that I had taken no part in this legislation, and probably would not, I objected because of the meager attendance of Senators at that time.

I am now informed, however, that a number of Senators, particularly on this side of the Chamber, are absent because, among other reasons, they believed and had the understanding that an agreement of this character would be entered into today and it was not necessary for them to be present. Under the circumstances I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there other objection to the request made by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not make any objection, Mr. President, but I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he will not consent to fix Thursday, the 28th instant, as the day for the vote?

Mr. McCUMBER. The legislative day of the 25th may run into Thursday. The unanimous-consent agreement for a vote in the Stephenson case, I will say to the Senator, provides for a vote on the legislative day of the 25th.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that the vote on the Stephenson matter is fixed for the legislative day of the 25th, but it is hardly possible we will be three days on that case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the chances are it will probably be three days before we get to a vote on that matter; that is, three calendar days. That would bring it over to Thursday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I very much wish the Senator would not fix it earlier than the 28th. I desire to say frankly to the Senator that some of us have been very much confined here this session. I am one of those. I desire to address myself to this question, and I expect to be away a little while about that time; so I hope the Senator will fix it so that the vote will not be taken earlier than the 28th, which is Thursday of next week, immediately after the Stephenson case shall have been disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would consent that the vote be taken on that day if I were certain that by that time we would have disposed of the other matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let it be immediately upon the completion of the Stephenson case, but not earlier than the 28th. I think that would accomplish the same purpose. That is Thursday of next week.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator I believe if we would fix it as I have suggested it would then be definite, while it must necessarily remain indefinite in the way the Senator has suggested—not earlier than a certain day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then we would take it up the next day, after we finish the consideration of the Stephenson matter; and, while I do not know, I think we will not be engaged upon that case more than three days. All I desire is to have a definite time fixed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, then, on the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, I will ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, a week from the coming Thursday——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The 28th.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know the date.

Mr. SIMMONS. The 28th.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, the 28th instant, immediately after the morning business, the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of this general pension bill and vote before 4 o'clock.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest that we agree to take the vote before adjournment on that day. I think that is the usual rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. We might get through and have plenty of time.

Mr. OVERMAN. We might and we might not. I have seen Senators cut off by fixing an hour on a particular day for a vote, and I suggest that the Senator make his request that we take a vote before adjournment on that day. I think we will take the vote on that day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am satisfied to place it that way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before adjournment on that legislative day, as I understand?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that immediately following the disposal of the routine morning business on the 28th instant House bill No. 1 be taken up for consideration, and that prior to adjournment upon that legislative day a vote be taken upon all amendments pending, or that may be offered, and upon the bill itself, to its final disposition. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to present an amendment which I propose to offer to House bill No. 1, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD and in amendment form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Insert after line 23, on page 4, the following:

"That any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge, and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor through causes not due to his own vicious habits, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month, without regard to his length of service."

PENSIONS AND INCREASES OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 187, the bill (S. 4624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, be referred again to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11824) to amend section 113 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, to report it favorably, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 19, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 18, 1912.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 18, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee for all the great, the pure, the strong, the noble, self-sacrificing men whom Thou hast raised up in every age to be the bearers of righteousness, truth, and justice, and to-day we join our hearts in thanksgiving and praise with the thousands who are celebrating the birth of Ireland's patron saint. We thank Thee for his life and character, which have lived through the ages and become the inspiration of thousands to do the work of the good Samaritan under the spiritual leadership of the Master. Help us to emulate his virtues and to do the work Thou hast given us to do with the same courage and fortitude which characterized his life, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 16, 1912, was read and approved.

Mr. BOEHNE assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC CO. (H. DOC. NO. 714).

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on Calendar Wednesday last, March 13, 1912, we had up for consideration the so-called hydro-electric bill, H. R. 12372. In my argument I used the testimony and record before the circuit court upon that bill. It is an important matter to me and an important matter to my district. I ask unanimous consent that I may have the opportunity to print that record as a House document. The subject is not yet settled, and I desire to have it so that it may be used later by the Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. What is the record?

Mr. RAKER. It is the record before the United States Circuit Court of the Ninth Judicial Circuit, Northern District of California—the case of United States of America v. Hydro-Electric Co.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have the record in the matter referred to in the United States Circuit Court, Ninth Judicial Circuit, Northern District of California, printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman wish to have the entire record printed?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; the complaint and answer and the testimony, with the affidavits, maps, and exhibits.

Mr. MANN. That is the testimony taken before the master in chancery?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How long will it be?

Mr. RAKER. From 150 to 250 pages of printed matter. It might be longer, but I do not believe so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BURIAL OF REMAINS OF SAILORS, U. S. S. "MAINE" (H. DOC. NO. 630).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the President of the United States:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 16, 1912.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: A memorial service for the dead of the (old) U. S. S. Maine will be held at the south front of the State, War, and Navy Department Building, Washington, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., Saturday, March 23, 1912, and immediately thereafter the remains of the men lately recovered from the wreck of that vessel at Habana will be interred with full military honors at Arlington National Cemetery.

I deem it desirable and fitting that the proposed ceremonies should be regarded as a national tribute to the ill-fated Maine and to the officers and enlisted men of her crew who lost their lives in the service of our country; and I have the honor to suggest that the Congress take such action as it may deem appropriate with a view to attending the memorial service and to making formal recognition of the occasion.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

The SPEAKER. This will be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEVEES, EAST SIDE OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar Senate concurrent resolution 18 and consider it at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 18.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be requested to make a supplemental or additional report or estimate concerning the work of levee construction in the improvement of the navigability of the Mississippi River on the east bank thereof from Vicksburg to Bayou Sara for use in connection with S. 4353, being a bill to aid in construction of levees and embankments on the east side of the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire why this should be passed at this time?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that this is an exceptional case, and one that I think can not be cited hereafter as a precedent for any violation of the rule in taking it up except upon the day when the Unanimous Consent Calendar is in order. There is a bill now pending before the Commerce Committee in the Senate, which looks to making an appropriation for building a levee on the Mississippi River south of Vicksburg, in front of a narrow strip of territory. The strip is so narrow, although there are contained within it about 500,000 acres, and the levee therefore so long that the people who are behind the levee have not themselves been able to raise the money with which to build it. The result is that this land has been overflowed to a very great depth by reason of the construction of the levees elsewhere. It is the insistence of those people that their lands have been "taken" within the purview of the Constitution. That bill has been introduced in the Senate, and the Senate Commerce Committee called upon the War Department for additional information upon the subject, but under the law the Chief of Engineers can not make any supplementary or additional report after he has once made his report upon a project, except in response to a concurrent resolution. So, when the Commerce Committee passed a resolution and sent it to the Secretary of War asking him for this additional information the request was returned with a citation to the statute. Therefore a concurrent resolution was then introduced in the Senate and passed. The reason why it is necessary to pass the resolution to-day is this: A hearing has been arranged for next Thursday before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate upon this particular matter. Gentlemen from a distance who are interested in the matter will be here upon that day, and the Senate Commerce Committee is anxious to have this additional information on hand when that hearing takes place. The matter was sent over here and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and they have reported this resolution.

I expected to get it passed to-day when the Unanimous Consent Calendar was called, but that, as the gentleman knows, has been put over until Thursday, and if we wait until Thursday to get up the Unanimous Consent Calendar it will then be too late to obtain the information for the Senate.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that if the Unanimous Consent Calendar were being called to-day this resolution would not be in order.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Because it was not put there in time?

Mr. MANN. It has not been on the calendar long enough. As I understand, the gentleman's request is for the purpose of getting information to be used by the Senate, by their request, for the hearing on Thursday before the Commerce Committee?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And just as courtesy to the Senate I ask that the rule be suspended.

Mr. MANN. Is this information now in the hands of the War Department so that they can come and make a report?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. The engineers state that they have the information and they could give it to the committee, except for the fact that the law forbids it.

Mr. MANN. And there is no expense?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. None.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the Senate concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE EXCISE-TAX BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21214, with Mr. MOON of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

[Mr. CLAYTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON]. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, I have been so profoundly impressed with my own limitations and the well-nigh boundless extent of the general subject involved that I have been in doubt, as I have attempted to investigate the subject from day to day, as to whether I should attempt to present my views to the House at all. And yet I have felt, as no doubt most of my colleagues feel, that we are taking a very important step and that we are dealing with a subject which goes to the roots of the powers of the Federal Government as outlined in the Constitution. I have felt, under such circumstances, that however well or ill a Member may make his contribution to the discussion, however incomplete his argument, however unsatisfactory his research, however inadequate the support he gives to his argument, he owes it to his brothers, to the country, and to himself to take some position and to present his views.

The taxing power of the Federal Government, as it is familiarly known to us all, is found in section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. About this section there has for more than a hundred years revolved a controversy of construction and disputation which has found its reflection in the action of political factions and in the trend of judicial decision. And yet, if I can, I intend to disassociate from the discussion which I am about to enter upon anything of a partisan, political nature, in an effort to ascertain the meaning, bearing, and effect of this bill as it relates to section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. It is as follows:

> SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

If you turn to section 2 of Article I, which has been, of course, affected by the fourteenth amendment, we find:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. * * *

If you turn to section 9, you find:

> No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

In these sections, Mr. Chairman, is embodied the grant and the limitations of the grant made to the Federal Government for the levying and collecting of taxes. But in order to understand the impotency of the Articles of Confederation, in order to understand that there was to be erected on the ruins of that old Confederation a great constitutional Government, in order to understand that we were now to abandon, if you please, the fatuous policy of some Æchean league and to establish in the heart of a nation a great organic instrument, we must recur to the provisions of the Articles of Confederation and discover, if we may, the kinship between some of these sections of the Constitution to which I have referred and the old provisions of the Articles of Confederation regarding the requisition for taxes.

In Article VIII of the Articles of Confederation it was provided that—

> All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint. The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

Of course the history of the efforts to collect taxes under Article VIII is common history. Requisition would be made upon the members of the Confederation, and it would not be met. The provision seemed ample in terms, but in execution it was impotent and fruitless, and it was because of the impotency and fruitlessness of section 8, coupled with the desire to eliminate the embarrassments which resulted from the checks and counterchecks in the commerce of the country that led to the establishment of the Constitution. These two reasons were the dominant and commanding reasons which dictated to the wise makers of the Constitution the necessity of abandoning the Articles of Confederation and lodging in the bosom of the Federal Government, first, the power to regulate commerce, and, second, the power to tax every dollars' worth of wealth beneath the flag, if necessary, in the common defense and for the general welfare. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In order that you may understand why I have thus stated, and do intend for some little time to consider, the origin of the opinions of the statesmen of the time, let me say that I conceive the questions now before this body to be these:

Two contentions are made concerning the pending bill. One is that it is lamentably defective, in that it taxes none but the thrifty and those engaged in productive enterprise, and the second is that if this is not true and it does reach the larger incomes of the country, it is violative of the Constitution as applied by the Supreme Court in its majority opinion in the Pollock case. Therefore it is proper to consider whether, in the light of judicial and political history, the Pollock decision is the last word upon the subject of direct taxation. And on that subject I direct the attention of my colleagues to the fact that the Supreme Court, in the consideration of the Pollock case, was dealing not with the question of property rights, was dealing not with a rule for the adjustment of personal rights, but was dealing with a great power vested in a great political sovereignty, without which we would be thrown back upon the impotency of the Articles of Confederation. In other words, it was the fixing of a great political policy, in the larger use of that term; it was the restricting of a great taxing power which had become necessary because of our experience under the Confederation, and I claim humbly that we have the right every day in the year and every year in the century to continue to contend that this political right or political power which was stricken down by the decision in the Pollock case should be restored, in order that the full power to legislate in reference to taxation may still be in the hands of Congress unimpaired. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, what was exactly the history of the discussion as to direct taxation? If you take the economic situation pure and simple as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, you have to refer for definitions to the volumes of the Physiocrats on economy; to Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, and to John Stuart Mill. And if you are trying to determine what is a direct and what is an indirect tax in a purely economic sense, if you contend that it was in its economic sense that it was used in the Constitution, you will find little or no comfort in investigating the sources which the statesmen of that day had as the foundation of their learning.

It has been contended by some writers that in the libraries of the makers of our Constitution you would find Adam Smith and the volumes of the Physiocrats, in which it was said that a direct tax was one which could not be shifted and that an indirect tax was one which could be shifted, and that, therefore, they wrote these articles in the Constitution with those economic definitions in mind. So far as my investigations go and so far as I have been able to come to any conclusion, I have no doubt that the influence upon the members of the Constitutional Convention which caused them to write "direct" and "indirect" into the Constitution came from the old Articles of Confederation; came more from the shibboleth of the Revolution, "Taxation without representation will not be suffered by a free people"; and they wrote first that taxation and representation should go hand in hand, and then that no capitation or land tax or direct tax should be levied except by "apportionment," because that had been the description of tax in Article VIII of the Confederation, and was the only one that could have been levied at a time when nine-tenths of all the population of the country were farmers and owned agricultural lands.

I know that there have been learned discussions about the meaning of "direct" and "indirect," but I prefer to refer you to one single circumstance as being almost conclusive of what the meaning of the term was in the Constitution. It is this: Mr. Hamilton, after the Constitution had been adopted, committed to the keeping of Mr. Madison a document which he called the constitution which he would have adopted if he had been allowed full power. I do not think anyone can claim that Mr. Hamilton did not know as much about the Constitution, about the purposes of it, about the design of it, about the failure of the Confederation, and about the impotency of the Confederation, as anyone who sat in the Constitutional Convention.

In Elliott's Debates there is a document which reads:

A copy of a paper communicated to James Madison by Col. Hamilton about the close of the convention in Philadelphia, in 1787, which he said delineated the constitution which he would have wished to be proposed by the convention.

He had stated the principles of it in the course of the deliberations of the convention. He then drafted a complete constitution according as he would have proposed it, and turned it over to Mr. Madison, and in the section corresponding to the one in the Constitution, about which we have had so much discussion and judicial controversy—in that section which we find in our Constitution to be that "No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid" without apportionment—we find that Mr. Hamilton wrote out in full what undoubtedly was the meaning of "direct" and "indirect" in the minds of the gentlemen in the Constitutional Convention. In Mr. Hamilton's draft of the Constitution, this section read:

SEC. 4. Taxes on land, houses, and other real estate, and capitation taxes, shall be proportioned in each State by the whole number of free persons, except Indians not taxed, and by three-fifths of all other persons.

Plainly he wrote into his section what was intended to have been written in section 9. That is, taxes on land, houses, or other real estate and capitation taxes were the only taxes that were conceived of by the makers of the Constitution to be apportioned according to the population at the last census.

I may add that Mr. Hamilton followed that by a long course of construction in after years, which only bore out the contention that he was writing in section 4 of his proposed constitution what was intended to be written in section 9 of the Constitution as adopted. And I repeat, for the sake of clearness, that the purpose was that by direct taxes were to be understood such taxes as were levied upon lands and other improvements and poll taxes, and none other.

Well, you say, is there anything in support of that? I direct your attention to Elliott's Debates on the Federal Constitution, volume 5, page 302, where appears the record of proceedings on Thursday, July 12, 1787:

In convention—Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to add to the clause empowering the legislature to vary the representation according to the principles of wealth and number of inhabitants, a proviso "that taxation shall be in proportion of representation."

Mr. Butler contended again that representation should be according to the full number of inhabitants, including all the blacks, admitting the justice of Mr. Gouverneur Morris's motion.

Mr. Mason also admitted the justness of the principle, but was afraid embarrassments might be occasioned to the legislature by it. It might drive the legislature to the plan of requisitions.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris admitted that some objections lay against his motion, but supposed they would be removed by restraining the rule to direct taxation. With regard to indirect taxes on exports and imports and on consumption, the rule would be inapplicable. Notwithstanding what had been said to the contrary, he was persuaded that the imports and consumption were pretty nearly equal throughout the Union.

From this it would appear that the word "direct," as used in the Constitution, was first suggested to distinguish between a tax levied upon the people and their property directly and a requisition made upon a colony or State by the Federal Government.

Let me say, from my own point of view, that I regard those terms wherever you see them in the literature of that day as a substantial shibboleth of the Revolution. You can not find anything anywhere about taxation in the days of the Articles of Confederation and preceding the Constitution in which the words "taxation and representation" do not occur together in the literature of the time. I am almost persuaded to say, after a hundred years from that time, that we are willing to say: "Whereas in those days the cry was 'no taxation without representation,' the cry to-day ought to be 'no representation without taxation.'" [Applause.]

Scarcely had the Constitution been adopted and the powers of taxation committed to the hands of the Federal Government when a tax was levied in what was known as the carriage act, which may be familiar to most of you, an act laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons. The tax was $10 on each carriage. It was not apportioned. It was simply levied under the doctrine of uniformity.

Mr. Daniel Hylton lived in Virginia, and, curiously enough, it is revealed by the record that he had 125 chariots, as they called them. The act said $10 a carriage upon carriages for private use or for hire, and the agreed state of facts in that case was that Mr. Daniel Hylton owned 125 chariots for private use and not for hire. Under this state of facts the first case—and I am sure I impose on some of you when I refer to it—came up for the consideration of the Supreme Court at the February term, 1796. On that morning Mr. Oliver Ellsworth was sworn in as the Chief Justice of the United States, and it is recited on the face of the report that he took his seat that morning in the court, although as a matter of fact he did not share in the opinion.

Curiously enough, Mr. Hamilton, who had been Secretary of the Treasury, appeared, more or less ill in health, as the counsel for the Government and argued the case in support of the power of the Federal Government to levy this tax upon carriages without apportionment; and in order that his views of the whole subject may be before you, I submit a fragment of his brief, which has been preserved among his works. This is found in volume 7, Works of Alexander Hamilton, page 328, and is as follows:

What is the distinction between direct and indirect taxes? It is a matter of regret that terms so uncertain and vague in so important a point are to be found in the Constitution. We shall seek in vain for any antecedent settled legal meaning to the respective terms; there is none.

We shall be as much at a loss to find any disposition of either which can satisfactorily determine the point.

Shall we call an indirect tax, a tax which is ultimately paid by a person, different from the one who pays it in the first instance?

Truly speaking, there is no such tax—those on imported articles best claim the character. But in many instances the merchant can not transfer the tax to the buyer; in numerous cases it falls on himself, partly or wholly. Besides, if the same article which is imported by a merchant for sale is imported by a merchant for his own use, or by a lawyer, a physician, or mechanic, for his own use, there can be no question about the transfer of the tax. It remains upon him who pays it.

According to that rule, then, the same tax may be both a direct and an indirect tax, which is an absurdity. To urge that a man may either buy an article already imported or import it himself amounts to nothing; sometimes he could not have that option.

But the option of an individual can not alter the nature of a thing. In like manner he might avoid the tax on carriages by hiring occasionally instead of buying.

The subject of taxation, not the contingent optional conduct of individuals, must be the criterion of direct or indirect taxation. Shall it be said that an indirect tax is that of which a man is not conscious when he pays? Neither is there any such tax. The ignorant may not see the tax in the enhanced price of the commodity, but the man of reflection knows it is there. Besides, when any but a merchant pays, as in the case of the lawyer, etc., who imports for himself, he can not but be conscious that it falls upon himself.

By this rule also, then a tax would be both direct and indirect—and it will be equally impracticable to find any other precise or satisfactory criterion.

In such a case no construction ought to prevail calculated to defeat the express and necessary authority of the Government. It would be contrary to reason, and to every rule of sound construction, to adopt a principle for regulating the exercise of a clear constitutional power which would defeat the exercise of the power.

It can not be contested that a duty on carriages specifically is as much within the authority of the Government as a duty on lands or buildings.

Now, if a duty on carriages is to be considered as a direct tax, to be apportioned according to the rates of representation, very absurd consequences must ensue.

'Tis possible that a particular State may have no carriages of the description intended to be taxed or a very small number.

But each State would have to pay a proportion of the sum to be laid, according to its relative numbers; yet while the State would have to pay a quota, it might have no carriages upon which its quota could be assessed, or so few as to render it ruinous to the owners to pay the tax. To consider, then, a duty on carriages as a direct tax may be to defeat the power of laying such a duty. This is a consequence which ought to ensue from construction.

Further: If the tax on carriages be a direct tax, that on ships, according to their tonnage, must be so likewise. Here is not a consumable article. Here the tax is paid by the owner of the thing taxed from time to time, as would be the tax on carriages.

If it be said that the tax is indirect because it is alternately paid by the freighter of the vessel, the answer is that sometimes the owner is himself the freighter and at other times the tonnage accrues when there is no freight and is a dead charge on the owner of the vessel.

Moreover, a tax on a hackney or stagecoach or other carriage, or on a dray or cart employed in transporting commodities for hire, would be as much a charge on the freight as a tax upon vessels, so that if the latter be an indirect tax the former can not be a direct tax.

And it would be too great a refinement for a rule of practice in government to say that a tax on a hackney or stagecoach and upon a dray or cart is an indirect one, and yet a tax upon a coach or wagon ordinarily used for the purposes of its owner is a direct one.

The only known source of the distinction between direct and indirect taxes is in the doctrine of the French economists—Locke and other speculative writers—who affirm that all taxes fall ultimately upon land, and are paid out of its produce, whether laid immediately upon itself or upon any other thing. Hence taxes upon lands are in that system called direct taxes; those on all other articles indirect taxes.

According to this, land taxes only would be direct taxes, but it is apparent that something more was intended by the Constitution. In one case a capitation is spoken of as a direct tax.

But how is the meaning of the Constitution to be determined? It has been affirmed, and so it will be found, that there is no general principle which can indicate the boundary between the two. That boundary, then, must be fixed by a species of arbitration, and ought to be such as will involve neither absurdity nor inconvenience.

The following are presumed to be the only direct taxes:

Capitation or poll taxes.

Taxes on lands and buildings.

General assessments, whether on the whole property of individuals or on their whole real or personal estate; all else must of necessity be considered as indirect taxes.

To apply a rule of apportionment according to numbers to taxes of the above description has some rationale in it; but to extend an apportionment of that kind to other cases would in many instances produce, as has been seen, preposterous consequences, and would greatly embarrass the operations of the Government. Nothing could be more capricious or outré than the application of quotas in such cases.

The Constitution gives power to Congress to lay and collect the taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, requiring that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Here duties, imposts, and excises appear to be contradistinguished from taxes, and while the latter is left to apportionment the former are enjoined to be left uniform.

But, unfortunately, there is equally here a want of criterion to distinguish duties, imposts, and excises from taxes.

If the meaning of the word "excise" is to be sought in the British statutes, it will be found to include duty on carriages, which is there considered as an excise, and then must necessarily be uniform and liable to apportionment; consequently not a direct tax.

An argument results from this, though not perhaps a conclusive one; yet where so important a distinction in the Constitution is to be realized it is fair to seek the meaning of terms in the statutory language of that country from which our jurisprudence is derived.

Still more curiously, Mr. Madison made it convenient, according to his own papers, to have published a letter written by a distinguished lawyer, challenging the constitutionality of the act, at just about the time the opinion of the court was to be rendered. The Chief Justice stated the case in substance. If you will permit me, I will refer to this discussion of the act.

Chase, Justice:

By the case stated only one question is submitted to the opinion of this court—whether the law of Congress of the 5th of June, 1794, entitled "An act to lay duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons," is unconstitutional and void.

The principles laid down to prove the above law void are these: That a tax on carriages is a direct tax, and therefore by the Constitution must be laid according to the census, directed by the Constitution to be taken, to ascertain the number of Representatives from each State, and that the tax in question on carriages is not laid by the rule of apportionment, but by the rule of uniformity prescribed by the Constitution in the case of duties, imposts, and excises; and a tax on carriages is not within either of those descriptions.

By the second section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their numbers, to be determined by the rule prescribed.

By the ninth section of the same article it is further provided that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census, or enumeration, before directed.

By the eighth section of the same article it was declared that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

As it was incumbent on the plaintiff's counsel in error, so they took great pains to prove that the tax on carriages was a direct tax; but they did not satisfy my mind. I think, at least, it may be doubted, and if I only doubted I should affirm the judgment of the circuit court. The deliberate decision of the National Legislature (who did not consider a tax on carriages a direct tax, but thought it was within the description of a duty) would determine me, if the case was doubtful, to receive the construction of the legislature; but I am inclined to think that a tax on carriages is not a direct tax within the letter or meaning of the Constitution.

The great object of the Constitution was to give Congress a power to lay taxes adequate to the exigencies of government, but they were to observe two rules in imposing them, namely, the rule of uniformity when they laid duties, imposts, or excises and the rule of apportionment, according to the census, when they laid any direct tax.

If there are any other species of taxes that are not direct and not included within the word "duties, imposts, or excises," they may be laid by the rule of uniformity or not, as Congress shall think proper and reasonable. If the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate other taxes than direct taxes and duties, imposts, and excises, there is great inaccuracy in their language. If these four species of taxes were all that were meditated the general power to lay taxes was unnecessary. If it was intended that Congress should have authority to lay only one of the four above enumerated, to wit, direct taxes by the rule of apportionment and the other three by the rule of uniformity, the expressions would have run thus: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect direct taxes and duties, imposts, and excises; the first shall be laid according to the census, and the three last shall be uniform throughout the United States." The power in the eighth section of the first article, to lay and collect taxes, included a power to lay direct taxes, whether capitation or any other, and also duties, imposts, and excises, and every other species or kind of tax whatsoever and called by any other name. Duties, imposts, and excises were enumerated after the general term taxes only for the purposes of declaring that they were to be laid by the rule of uniformity. I consider the Constitution to stand in this manner. A general power is given to Congress to lay and collect taxes of every kind or nature without any restraint, except only on exports, but two rules are prescribed for their government, namely, uniformity and apportionment; three kinds of taxes, to wit, duties, imposts, and excises by the first rule and capitation or other direct taxes by the second rule.

I believe some taxes may be both direct and indirect at the same time. If so, would Congress be prohibited from laying such a tax because it is partly a direct tax?

The Constitution evidently contemplated no taxes as direct taxes, but only such as Congress could lay in proportion to the census. The rule of apportionment is only to be adopted in such cases where it can reasonably apply, and the subject taxed must ever determine the application of the rule.

If it is proposed to tax any specific article by the rule of apportionment, and it would evidently create great inequality and injustice, it is unreasonable to say that the Constitution intended such tax should be laid by that rule.

It appears to me that a tax on carriages can not be laid by the rule of apportionment without very great inequality and injustice. For example, suppose two States, equal in census, to pay $80,000 each by a tax on carriages, of $8 on every carriage, and in one State there are 100 carriages and in the other 1,000. The owners of carriages in one State would pay 10 times the tax of owners in the other. A in one State would pay for his carriage $8, but B in the other State would pay for his carriage $80.

It was argued that a tax on carriages was a direct tax and might be laid according to the rule of apportionment, and, as I understood, in this manner: Congress, after determining on the gross sum to be raised, was to apportion it according to the census and then lay it in one State on carriages, in another on horses, in a third on tobacco, in a fourth on rice, and so on. I admit that this mode might be adopted, to raise a certain sum in each State, according to the census, but it would not be a tax on carriages, but on a number of specific articles; and it seems to me that it would be liable to the same objection of abuse and oppression as a selection of any one article in all the States.

I think an annual tax on carriages for the conveyance of persons may be considered as within the power granted to Congress to lay duties. The term duty is the most comprehensive next to the generical term tax; and practically in Great Britain, whence we take our general ideas of taxes, duties, imposts, excises, customs, etc., embraces taxes on stamps, tolls for passage, etc., and is not confined to taxes on importation only.

It seems to me that a tax on expense is an indirect tax; and I think an annual tax on a carriage for the conveyance of persons is of that kind, because a carriage is a consumable commodity, and such annual tax on it is on the expense of the owner.

I am inclined to think, but of this I do not give a judicial opinion, that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution are only two, to wit, a capitation or poll tax, simply with regard to property, profession, or any other circumstance, and a tax on land. I doubt whether a tax by a general assessment of personal property within the United States is included within the term direct taxes.

Paterson, Justice.—By the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States it is ordained that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

The eighth section of the said article declares that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The ninth section of the same article provides that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration before directed to be taken.

Congress passed a law on the 5th of June, 1794, entitled "An act laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons."

Daniel Lawrence Hilton, on the 5th of June, 1794, and therefrom to the last day of September next following, owned, possessed, and kept 125 chariots for the conveyance of persons, but exclusively for his own separate use, and not to let out to hire, or for the conveyance of persons for hire.

The question is whether a tax upon carriages be a direct tax. If it be a direct tax, it is unconstitutional, because it has been laid pursuant to the rule of uniformity and not to the rule of apportionment. In behalf of the plaintiff in error it has been urged that a tax on carriages does not come within the description of a duty, impost, or excise and therefore is a direct tax. It has, on the other hand, been contended that as a tax on carriages is not a direct tax it must fall within one of the classifications just enumerated, and particularly must be a duty or excise. The argument on both sides turns in a circle; it is not a duty, impost, or excise, and therefore must be a direct tax; it is not a tax, therefore it must be a duty or excise. What is the natural and common or technical or appropriate meaning of the words "duty" and "excise"? It is not easy to ascertain. They present no clear and precise idea to the mind. Different persons will annex different significations to the terms. It was, however, obviously the intention of the framers of the Constitution that Congress should possess full power over every species of taxable property except exports. The term taxes is generical and was made use of to vest in Congress plenary authority in all cases of taxations. The general division of taxes is into direct and indirect. Although the latter term is not to be found in the Constitution, yet the former necessarily implies it. Indirect stands opposed to direct. There may perhaps be an indirect tax on a particular article that can not be comprehended within the description of duties or imposts, or excises; in such case it will be comprised under the general denomination of taxes. For the term tax is the genus and includes—

1. Direct taxes.
2. Duties, imposts, and excises.
3. All other classes of an indirect kind and not within any of the classifications enumerated under the preceding heads.

The question occurs, How is such a tax to be laid, uniformly or apportionately? The rule of uniformity will apply, because it is an indirect tax, and direct taxes only are to be apportioned. What are direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution? The Constitution declares that a capitation tax is a direct tax, and both in theory and practice a tax on land is deemed to be a direct tax. In this way the terms "direct taxes" and "capitation and other direct taxes" are satisfied. It is not necessary to determine whether a tax on the product of land be a direct or indirect tax. Perhaps the immediate product of land, in its original and crude state, ought to be considered as the land itself—it makes a part of it—or else the provision made against taxing exports would be easily eluded. Land independently of its produce is of no value. When the produce is converted into a manufacture it assumes a new shape, its nature is altered, its original state is changed, it becomes quite another subject, and will be differently considered. Whether direct taxes in the sense of the Constitution comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and tax on land is a questionable point. If Congress, for instance, should tax in the aggregate or mass things that generally pervade all the States in the Union, then perhaps the rule of apportionment would be the most proper, especially if an assessment was to intervene. This appears by the practice of some of the States to have been considered as a direct tax. Whether it be so under the Constitution of the United States is a matter of some difficulty; but as it is not before the court it would be improper to give any decisive opinion upon it. I never entertained a doubt that the principal—I will not say the only—objects that the framers of the Constitution contemplated as falling within the rule of apportionment were a capitation tax and a tax on land. Local considerations and the particular circumstances and relative situation of the States naturally lead to this view of the subject. The provision was made in favor of the Southern States. They possessed a large number of slaves; they had extensive tracts of territory, thinly settled, and not very productive. A majority of the States had but few slaves, and several of them a limited territory, well settled, and in a high state of cultivation. The Southern States, if no provision had been introduced in the Constitution, would have been wholly at the mercy of the other States. Congress in such case might tax slaves at discretion or arbitrarily, and land in every part of the Union after the same rate or measure—so much a head in the first instance and so much an acre in the second. To guard them against imposition in these particulars was the reason of introducing the clause in the Constitution, which directs that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers.

On the part of the plaintiff in error it has been contended that the rule of apportionment is to be favored rather than the rule of uniformity; and, of course, that the instrument is to receive such a construction as will extend the former and restrict the latter. I am not of that opinion. The Constitution has been considered as an accommodating system; it was the effect of mutual sacrifices and concessions; it was the work of compromise. The rule of apportionment is of this nature; it is radically wrong; it can not be supported by any solid reasoning. Why should slaves, who are a species of property, be represented more than any other property? The rule, therefore, ought not to be extended by construction.

Again, numbers do not afford a just estimate or rule of wealth. It is, indeed, a very uncertain and incompetent sign of opulence. There is another reason against the extension of the principle laid down in the Constitution.

The counsel on the part of the plaintiff in error have further urged that an equal participation of the expense or burden by the several States in the Union was the primary object which the framers of the Constitution had in view, and that this object will be effected by the principle of apportionment, which is an operation upon States and not on individuals, for each State will be debited for the amount of its quota of the tax and credited for its payments. This brings it to the old system of requisitions. An equal rule is doubtless the best. But how is this to be applied to States or to individuals? The latter are the objects of taxation, without reference to the States, except in the case of direct taxes. The fiscal power is exerted certainly, equally, and effectually on individuals; it can not be exerted on States. The history of the United Netherlands and of our own country will evince the truth of this position. The Government of the United States could not go on under the Confederation, because Congress were obliged to proceed in the line of requisition. Congress could not under the old Confederation raise money by taxes, be the public exigencies ever so pressing and great. They had no coercive authority; if they had, it must have been exercised against the delinquent States, which would be ineffectual or terminate in separation. Requisitions were a dead letter unless the State legislatures could be brought into action, and when they were the sums raised were very disproportional. Unequal contributions or payments engendered discontent and fomented State jealousy. Whenever it shall be thought necessary or expedient to lay a direct tax on land, where the object is one and the same, it is to be apprehended that it will be a fund not much more productive than that of requisition under the former Government. Let us put the case: A given sum is to be raised from the landed property in the United States. It is easy to apportion this sum or to assign to each State its quota. The Constitution gives the rule. Suppose the proportion of North Carolina to be $80,000. This sum is to be laid on the landed property in the State. But by what rule and by whom? Shall every acre pay the same sum, without regard to its quality, value, situation, or productiveness? This would be manifestly unjust. Do the laws of the different States furnish sufficient data for the purpose of forming one common rule, comprehending the quality, situation, and value of the lands? In some of the States there has been no land tax for several years, and where there has been the mode of laying the tax is so various and the diversity in the land is so great that no common principle can be deduced and carried into practice. Do the laws of each State furnish data from whence to extract a rule whose operation shall be equal and certain in the same State? Even this is doubtful. Besides, subdivisions will be necessary; the apportionment of the State, and perhaps of a particular part of the State, is again to be apportioned among counties, townships, parishes, or districts. If the lands be classed, then a specific value must be annexed to each class. And there a question arises, How often are classifications and assessments to be made—annually, triennially, septennially? The oftener they are made the greater will be the expense, and the seldomer they are made the greater will be the inequality and injustice. In the process of the operation a number of persons will be necessary to class, to value, and to assess the land, and after all the guards and provisions that can be devised we must ultimately rely upon the discretion of the officers in the exercise of their functions. Tribunals of appeal must also be instituted to hear and decide upon unjust valuations, or the assessors will act ad libitum, without check or control. The work, it is to be feared, will be operose and unproductive, and full of inequality, injustice, and oppression. Let us, however, hope that a system of land taxation may be so corrected and matured by practice as to become easy and equal in its operation and productive and beneficial in its effects. But to return. A tax on carriages, if apportioned, would be oppressive and pernicious. How would it work? In some States there are many carriages and in others but few. Shall the whole sum fall on one or two individuals in a State who may happen to own and possess carriages? The thing would be absurd and inequitable. In answer to this objection it has been observed that the sum and not the tax is to be apportioned, and that Congress may select in the different States different articles or objects from whence to raise the apportioned sum. The idea is novel. What, shall land be taxed in one State, slaves in another, carriages in a third, and horses in a fourth, or shall several of these be thrown together in order to levy and make the quotaed sum? The scheme is fanciful. It would not work well, and, perhaps, is utterly impracticable. It is easy to discern that great and perhaps insurmountable obstacles must arise in forming the subordinate arrangements necessary to carry the system into effect; when formed the operation would be slow and expensive, unequal, and unjust. If a tax upon land, where the object is simple and uniform throughout the States, is scarcely practicable, what shall we say of a tax attempted to be apportioned among and raised and collected from a number of dissimilar objects? The difficulty will increase with the number and variety of the things proposed for taxation. We shall be obliged to resort to intricate and endless valuations and assessments, in which everything will be arbitrary and nothing certain. There will be no rule to walk by. The rule of uniformity, on the contrary, implies certainty and leaves nothing to the will and pleasure of the assessor. In such case the object and the sum coincide, the rule and the thing unite, and, of course, there can be no imposition. The truth is that the articles taxed in one State should be taxed in another; in this way the spirit of jealousy is appeased and tranquillity preserved; in this way the pressure on industry will be equal in the several States and the relation between the different subjects of taxation duly preserved. Apportionment is an operation on States, and involves valuations and assessments, which are arbitrary and should not be resorted to but in case of necessity. Uniformity is an instant operation on individuals, without the intervention of assessments or any regard to States, and is at once easy, certain, and efficacious. All taxes on expenses or consumption are indirect taxes. A tax on carriages is of this kind, and, of course, is not a direct tax. Indirect taxes are circuitous modes of reaching the revenues of individuals who generally live according to their income. In many cases of this nature the individual may be said to tax himself. I shall close the discourse with reading a passage or two from Smith's Wealth of Nations:

"The impossibility of taxing people in proportion to their revenue by any capitation seems to have given occasion to the invention of taxes upon consumable commodities; the State not knowing how to tax directly and proportionally the revenue of its subjects, endeavors to tax it indirectly by taxing their expense, which is supposed in most cases will be nearly in proportion to their revenue. Their expense is taxed by taxing the consumable commodities upon which it is laid out. (Vol. 3, p. 331.)

"Consumable commodities, whether necessaries or luxuries, may be taxed in two different ways—the consumer may either pay an annual sum on account of his using or consuming goods of a certain kind, or the goods may be taxed while they remain in the hands of the dealer and before they are delivered to the consumer. The consumable goods which last a considerable time before they are consumed altogether are most properly taxed in the one way; those of which the consumption is immediate or more speedy, in the other; the coach tax and plate tax are examples of the former method of imposing; the greater part of the other duties of excise and customs of the latter." (Vol. 3, p. 341.)

Iredell, Justice: I agree in opinion with my brothers, who have already expressed theirs, that the tax in question is agreeable to the Constitution; and the reasons which have satisfied me can be delivered in a very few words, since I think the Constitution itself affords a clear guide to decide the controversy.

The Congress possesses the power of taxing all taxable objects without limitation, with the particular exception of a duty on exports.

There are two restrictions only on the exercise of this authority:

1. All direct taxes must be apportioned.

2. All duties, imports, and excises must be uniform.

If the carriage tax be a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, it must be apportioned.

If it be a duty, impost, or excise within the meaning of the Constitution, it must be uniform.

If it can be considered as a tax neither direct within the meaning of the Constitution nor comprehended within the term "duty, impost, or excise," there is no provision in the Constitution on way or another, and then it must be left to such an operation of the power as if the authority to lay taxes had been given generally in all instances without saying whether they should be apportioned or uniform; and in that case, I should presume, the tax ought to be uniform, because the present Constitution was particularly intended to affect individuals and not States, except in particular cases specified. And this is the leading distinction between the Articles of Confederation and the present Constitution.

As all direct taxes must be apportioned, it is evident that the Constitution contemplated none as direct but such as could be apportioned.

If this can not be apportioned, it is therefore not a direct tax in the sense of the Constitution.

That this tax can not be apportioned is evident. Suppose $10 contemplated as a tax on each chariot or post chaise in the United States and the number of both in all the United States be computed at 105, the number of Representatives in Congress.

This would produce in the whole $1,050.

The share of Virginia, being $\frac{19}{105}$ parts, would be $190.

The share of Connecticut, being $\frac{7}{105}$ parts, would be $70.

Then suppose Virginia had 50 carriages, Connecticut 2.

The share of Virginia being $190, this must, of course, be collected from the owners of carriages, and there would therefore be collected from each carriage $3.80. The share of Connecticut being $70, each carriage would pay $35.

If any State had no carriages, there could be no apportionment at all. This mode is too manifestly absurd to be supported and has not even been attempted in debate.

But two expedients have been proposed of a very extraordinary nature to evade the difficulty.

1. To raise the money a tax on carriages would produce not by levying a tax on each carriage uniformly, but by selecting different articles in different States, so that the amount paid in each State may be equal to the sum due upon a principle of apportionment. One State might pay by a tax on carriages, another by a tax on slaves, etc.

I should have thought this merely an exercise of ingenuity, if it had not been pressed with some earnestness; and as this was done by gentlemen of high respectability in their profession, it deserves a serious answer, though it is very difficult to give such a one.

1. This is not an opportionment of a tax on carriages, but of the money a tax on carriages might be supposed to produce, which is quite a different thing.

2. It admits that Congress can not lay a uniform tax on all carriages in the Union in any mode, but that they may on carriages in one or more States. They may therefore lay a tax on carriages in 14 States, but not in the fifteenth.

3. If Congress, according to this new decree, may select carriages as a proper object in one or more States, but omit them in others, I presume they may omit them in all and select other articles. Suppose, then, a tax on carriages would produce $100,000 and a tax on horses a like sum—$100,000—and a hundred thousand dollars were to be apportioned according to that mode. Gentlemen might amuse themselves with calling this a tax on carriages or a tax on horses, while not a single carriage nor a single horse was taxed throughout the Union.

4. Such an arbitrary method of taxing different States differently is a suggestion altogether new, and would lead, if practiced, to such dangerous consequences that it will require very powerful arguments to show that that method of taxing would be in any manner compatible with the Constitution, with which at present I deem it utterly irreconcilable, it being altogether destructive of the notion of a common interest, upon which the very principles of the Constitution are founded so far as the condition of the United States will admit.

The second expedient proposed was that of taxing carriages, among other things, in a general assessment. This amounts to saying that Congress may lay a tax on carriages, but that they may not do it unless they blend it with other subjects of taxation. For this no reason or authority has been given, and in addition to other suggestions offered by the counsel on that side, affords an irrefragable proof that when positions plainly so untenable are offered to counteract the principle contended for by the opposite counsel the principle itself is a right one, for no one can doubt that if better reasons could have been offered they would not have escaped the sagacity and learning of the gentlemen who offered them.

There is no necessity or propriety in determining what is or is not a direct or indirect tax in all cases.

Some difficulties may occur which we do not at present foresee. Perhaps a direct tax in the sense of the Constitution can mean nothing but a tax on something inseparably annexed to the soil—something capable of apportionment under all such circumstances.

A land or a poll tax may be considered of this description.

The latter is to be considered so particularly under the present Constitution on account of the slaves in the Southern States who give a ratio in the representation in the proportion of 3 to 5.

Either of these is capable of apportionment.

In regard to other articles there may possibly be considerable doubt.

It is sufficient on the present occasion for the court to be satisfied that this is not a direct tax contemplated by the Constitution in order to affirm the present judgment, since if it can not be apportioned it must necessarily be uniform.

I am clearly of opinion this is not a direct tax in the sense of the Constitution and therefore that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Wilson, justice:

As there were only four judges, including myself, who attended the argument in this cause, I should have thought it proper to join in the decision, though I had before expressed a judicial opinion on the subject in the circuit court of Virginia, did not the unanimity of the other three judges relieve me from the necessity? I shall now, however, only add that my sentiments in favor of the constitutionality of the tax in question have not been changed.

That decision was the beginning of the judicial history of the construction of this language, and it was a direct holding that it was an indirect tax within the meaning of the Constitution; and that a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution was either a capitation or a land tax.

At about the same time legislative construction of this section began. Now, if you have a contemporaneous discussion of the period, and that shows that by a direct tax was meant only a tax on land or a poll tax; if you have conclusive judicial utterances and that branch of the Government declares unequivocally that by a direct tax was meant a tax on land or a poll tax; if you consult still further the legislative branch of the Government to discover the meaning of the term there, and you find that it held that a direct tax was a land or poll tax, you have brought to bear on the subject all the information, all of the lights, all of the standards by which interpretation can be safely followed.

Congress in 1798 levied the first direct tax. It exercised the power impliedly and negatively conferred by section 9 of Article I for the first time in 1798.

Quoting now from Mr. Charles F. Dunbar, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1888–89:

The acts of 1798 established the general plan on which all succeeding direct taxes have been levied. These acts apportioned the total sum of $2,000,000 among the States, divided them all into convenient subdivisions, placed every division under a commissioner, and provided the requisite array of principal and assistant assessors, collectors, supervisors, and inspectors. The quota of every State was to be assessed upon houses, lands, dwelling houses, and slaves. Houses were to be assessed according to a classified valuation at rates fixed for the whole Union, and slaves were to be assessed 50 cents per head if between 12 and 50 years of age; and so much of the quota of any State as was not covered by the levy upon houses and slaves was to be assessed upon lands and improvements at such rates as might be required to make up the deficiency. The tax was to be a lien upon the real estate and slaves of the person assessed for two years from the date when it became payable, and collection could be enforced by distraint and sale of personal effects. Wolcott had suggested, but had also disapproved, a plan for fixing a time at which a State might pay its quota into the Treasury and for prescribing collection by the authority of the United States "in cases of delinquency." But no trace of any such plan is to be found in the acts of 1798. Beyond the bare apportionment the States are not recognized, except as mere geographical divisions. The acts provide solely for levy by the Federal Government upon its citizens, the individual taxpayer is the only party responsible, and no authority stands or can interpose between him and his Government.

The framers of the direct-tax acts of 1813 followed in general the lines laid down in 1798. Comparison of the acts will show revision and rearrangement and perhaps simplification of the system, but no serious change of theory. The tax of three millions is apportioned to the counties in every State, and it is provided that the State legislature may by act vary the county quotas, provided such alterations are duly certified to the Secretary of the Treasury; but the levy according to such alterations is made by virtue of the act of Congress and not under the act of the State legislature. The tax is to be levied on the value of lands, houses, and slaves "at the rate each of them is worth in money," abandoning the peculiar method of a residual assessment upon land, adopted in 1798; and the provisions as to enforcement by lien and distress remain as before. In short, the theory of the acts of 1813 continues to be that of a levy by the General Government upon the individual citizen, in no way different in principle from any case of national internal taxation. With a wise regard to convenience, however, the apportioning act provided that any State "may pay its quota into the Treasury of the United States," and thus secure a deduction of 15 per cent by paying before February 10, 1814, or of 10 per cent by paying before May 1, "and no further proceedings shall thereafter be had under this act in such State." The option thus allowed to the States did not, however, change the character of the tax as a tax upon individuals or make it a tax upon States. Seven States assumed the payment of their quotas, but the other 11, in which the collection by Federal officers was made as originally provided, were not for that reason in any sense delinquent as States, nor did they thereby fail in any obligation to be found in the acts of Congress or elsewhere.

The act of 1815, which provided for an annual tax of $6,000,000, is to a considerable extent a literal transcript from the two acts of 1813, with such amendments in detail as experience or the proposed permanency of the tax required, but with no change in theory or in general procedure. And no change was made by the act of 1816, which simply repealed the provision for an annual tax and laid instead a tax of three millions for the current year. In 1815, and also in 1816, 4 States assumed the payment of their quotas, and the collection was made by the United States in the other 14.

When the levy of direct taxation by apportionment was resorted to for the fifth time, in 1861, Congress found most of the work of legislation done for it in advance. The first revenue measure of the war provided for an annual direct tax of twenty millions to be laid on the value of lands with their improvements and dwelling houses "at the rate each of them is worth in money." In its general scheme and in its details the act of 1861 was a revised transcript of the acts of 1813 and 1815. The theory enunciated in Hylton v. United States was unfamiliar to many Members, and the Committee on Ways and Means had to labor in debate with Representatives who wished to include personal estate, or incomes, among the objects of taxation. The committee itself at first treated slaves as taxable property, as was done in the earlier acts. But, in its careful provision for dealing directly with the individual citizen of the United States and for enforcing a direct lien upon his property, the law of 1861 follows the earlier legislation, section by section.

I need not say that the returns which are given here following each of these levies show how utterly futile and fruitless have been the levy of these five taxes by direct apportionment.

What is the significance of these five levies? The significance is that from 1798 until 1861 this branch of the Government, the revenue-raising branch of the Government, which by tradition and by history and by constitutional provision is compelled to give its attention to the raising of revenue, had uniformly construed the Constitution to be that direct taxes meant land taxes and capitation taxes, and nothing more and nothing less. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We do not have to rely upon this collateral stream of interpretation coming from the Congress of the United States. We can go to the other acts or decisions of the courts as they come along down from the foundation of the Hylton case. I do not intend, nor would I have the time, to read these cases as they come down, because most or many, if not all, of you know what the judicial determination has been, but following the Hylton case came the case of the Pacific Insurance Co. versus Soule, reported in 7 Wallace, page 433. This was an income tax or duty laid by sections 105 and 120 of the act of June 30, 1864, and the amendment thereto of July 13, 1866, upon the amounts insured, renewed, or continued by insurance companies, upon the gross amounts of premiums received and assessments made by them, and also upon dividends, undistributed sums, and income. It reached the Supreme Court of the United States on a certificate of division from the circuit court of California. The second question certified was whether the taxes paid by the plaintiff and sought to be recovered back in this action are not direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution. Mr. Justice Swayne delivered the opinion of the court, and in doing so, on this branch of the subject, said:

In considering this subject it is proper to advert to the several provisions of the Constitution relating to taxation by Congress.

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which shall be included in this Union according to their respective numbers, etc.

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

"No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census of enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

"No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

These clauses contain the entire grant of the taxing power by the organic law, with the limitations which that instrument imposes.

The National Government, though supreme within its own sphere, is one of limited jurisdiction and specific functions. It has no faculties but such as the Constitution has given it, either expressly or incidentally by necessary intendment.

Whenever any act done under its authority is challenged, the proper sanction must be found in its charter or the act is ultra vires and void. This test must be applied in the examination of the question before us. If the tax to which it refers is a "direct tax," it is clear that it has not been laid in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution. It is therefore necessary to ascertain to which of the categories named in the eighth section of the first article it belongs.

What are direct taxes was elaborately argued and considered by this court in Hylton v. United States, decided in the year 1796. One of the members of the court, Justice Wilson, had been a distinguished member of the convention which framed the Constitution. It was unanimously held by the four justices who heard the argument that a tax upon carriages kept by the owner for his own use was not a direct tax. Justice Chase said:

"I am inclined to think—but of this I do not give a judicial opinion—that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution are only two, to wit, a capitation of poll tax simply, without regard to property, profession, or any other circumstances, and a tax on land."

Patterson, Justice, followed in the same line of remark. He said:

"I never entertained a doubt that the principal—I will not say the only—object the framers of the Constitution contemplated as falling within the rule of apportionment was a capitation tax and a tax on land. The Constitution declares that a capitation tax is a direct tax, and both in theory and practice a tax on land is deemed to be a direct tax. In this way the terms 'direct taxes' and 'capitation and other direct tax' are satisfied."

The views expressed in this case are adopted by Chancellor Kent and Justice Story in their examination of the subject.

Duties are defined by Tomlin to be things due and recoverable by law. The term, in its widest significance, is hardly less comprehensive than "taxes." It is applied, in its most restricted meaning, to customs, and in that sense is nearly the synonym of "imposts."

Impost is a duty on imported goods and merchandise. In a larger sense it is any tax or imposition. Cowell says it is distinguished from custom "because custom is rather the profit which the prince makes on goods shipped out." Mr. Madison considered the terms "duties" and "imposts" in these clauses as synonymous. Judge Tucker thought "they were probably intended to comprehend every species of tax or contribution not included under the ordinary terms "taxes and excises."

Excise is defined to be an inland imposition, sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity and sometimes upon the retail sale; sometimes upon the manufacturer and sometimes upon the vendor.

The taxing power is given in the most comprehensive terms. The only limitations imposed are: That direct taxes, including the capitation tax, shall be apportioned; that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform; and that no duties shall be imposed upon articles exported from any State. With these exceptions the exercise of the power is, in all respects, unfettered.

If a tax upon carriages kept for his own use by the owner is not a direct tax we can see no ground upon which a tax upon the business of an insurance company can be held to belong to that class of revenue charges.

It has been held that Congress may require direct taxes to be laid and collected in the Territories as well as in the States.

The consequences which would follow the apportionment of the tax in question among the States and Territories of the Union in the manner prescribed by the Constitution must not be overlooked. They are very obvious. Where such corporations are numerous and rich it might be light, where none exists it could not be collected, where they are few and poor it would fall upon them with such weight as to involve annihilation. It can not be supposed that the framers of the Constitution intended that any tax should be apportioned, the collection of which on that principle would be attended with such results. The consequences are fatal to the proposition.

To the question under consideration it must be answered that the tax to which it relates is not a direct tax, but a duty or excise; that it was obligatory on the plaintiff to pay it.

The other questions certified up are deemed to be sufficiently answered by the answers given to the first and sixth questions.

The next case is that of Veazie Bank v. Fenno, in Eighth Wallace, page 533. This case arose under the act of July 13, 1866. The second clause of the ninth section of which enacts:

That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 per cent on the amount of notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association used for circulation and paid out by them after the 1st day of August, 1866, and such tax shall be assessed and paid in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The Veazie Bank was a corporation chartered by the State of Maine with authority to issue bank notes for circulation, and the notes upon which the tax imposed by the act was collected were issued under this authority. There was nothing in the case showing that the bank sustained any relation to the State as a financial agent or that its authority to issue notes was conferred or exercised with any special reference to other than private interests. The case was presented to the court upon an agreed statement of facts and, upon a prayer for instructions to the jury, the judges found themselves opposed in opinion on three questions, the first of which—the two others differing from it in form only and not needing to be cited—was this:

Whether the second clause of the ninth section of the act of Congress of the 13th of July, 1866, under which the tax in this case was levied and collected, is a valid and constitutional law.

Mr. Chief Justice Chase, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The general intent of the Constitution, however, seems plain. The General Government, administered by the Congress of the Confederation, has been reduced to the verge of impotency by the necessity of relying for revenue upon requisitions on the States, and it was a leading object in the adoption of the Constitution to relieve the Government to be organized under it from this necessity and to confer upon it ample power to provide revenue by the taxation of persons and property. And nothing is clearer, from the discussions in the convention and the discussions which preceded final ratification by the necessary number of States, than the purpose to give this power to Congress, as to the taxation of everything, except exports, in its fullest extent.

This purpose is apparent, also, from the terms in which the taxing power is granted. The power is "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." More comprehensive words could not have been used. Exports only are, by another provision, excluded from its application.

There are, indeed, certain virtual limitations arising from the principles of the Constitution itself. It would undoubtedly be an abuse of the power if so exercised as to impair the separate existence and independent self-government of the States, or if exercised for ends inconsistent with the limited grants of power in the Constitution.

And there are directions as to the mode of exercising the power. If Congress sees fit to impose a capitation or other direct tax, it must be laid in proportion to the census; if Congress determines to impose duties, imposts, and excises, they must be uniform throughout the United States. These are not strictly limitations of power. They are rules prescribing the mode in which it shall be exercised. It still extends to every object of taxation except exports, and may be applied to every object of taxation to which it extends in such measure as Congress may determine.

The comprehensiveness of the power thus given to Congress may serve to explain, at least, the absence of any attempt by members of the convention to define, even in debate, the terms of the grant. The words used certainly describe the whole power, and it was the intention of the convention that the whole power should be conferred. The definition of particular words, therefore, became unimportant.

It may be said, indeed, that this observation, however just in its application to the general grant of power, can not be applied to the rules by which different descriptions of taxes are directed to be laid and collected.

Direct taxes must be laid and collected by the rule of apportionment; duties, imposts, and excises must be laid and collected under the rule of uniformity.

Much diversity of opinion has always prevailed upon the question, What are direct taxes? Attempts to answer it by reference to the definitions of political economists have been frequently made, but without satisfactory results. The enumeration of the different kinds of taxes which Congress was authorized to impose was probably made with very little reference to their speculations. The great work of Adam Smith, the first comprehensive treatise on political economy in the English language, had then been recently published; but in this work, though there are passages which refer to the characterstic difference between direct and indirect taxation, there is nothing which affords any valuable light on the use of the words "direct taxes" in the Constitution.

We are obliged, therefore, to resort to historical evidence, and to seek the meaning of the words in the use and in the opinion of those whose relations to the Government and means of knowledge warranted them in speaking with authority.

And considered in this light the meaning and application of the rule as to direct taxes appears to us quite clear.

It is, as we think, distinctly shown in every act of Congress on the subject.

In each of these acts a gross sum was laid upon the United States, and the total amount was apportioned to the several States according to their respective numbers of inhabitants as ascertained by the last preceding census. Having been apportioned, provision was made for the imposition of the tax upon the subjects specified in the act, fixing its total sum.

In 1798 when the first direct tax was imposed the total amount was fixed at $2,000,000; in 1813 the amount of the second direct tax was fixed at three millions; in 1815 the amount of the third, say, six millions, and it was made an annual tax; in 1816 the provision making the tax annual was repealed by the repeal of the first section of the act of 1815, and the total amount was fixed for that year at $3,000,000. No other direct tax was imposed until 1861, when a direct tax of $20,000,000 was laid and made annual, but the provision making it annual was suspended and no tax except that first laid was ever apportioned. In each instance the total sum was apportioned among the States by the constitutional rule, and was assessed at prescribed rates on the subjects of the tax. These subjects in 1798, 1813, 1815, and 1816 were lands, improvements, dwelling houses, and slaves; and in 1861, lands, improvements, and dwelling houses only. Under the act of 1798 slaves were assessed at fifty on each; under the other acts according to valuation by assessors.

This review shows that personal property, contracts, occupations, and the like, have never been regarded by Congress as proper subjects of direct tax. It has been supposed that slaves must be considered as an exception to this observation, but the exception is rather apparent than real. As persons slaves were proper subjects of a capitation tax, which is described in the Constitution as a direct tax; as property they were by the laws of some, if not most of the States, classed as real property descendible to heirs. Under the first view they would be subject to the tax of 1798 as a capitation tax; under the latter they would be subject to the taxation of other years as realty. That the latter view was that taken by the framers of the acts after 1798 becomes highly probable when it is considered that in the States where slaves were held much of the value which would otherwise have attached to land passed into the slaves. If, indeed, the land only had been valued without the slaves, the land would have been subject to much heavier proportional imposition in those States than in States where there were no slaves, for the proportion of tax imposed on each State was determined by population without reference to the subjects on which it was to be assessed.

The fact, then, that slaves were valued under the acts referred to, far from showing, as some have supposed, that Congress regarded personal property as a proper object of direct taxation under the Constitution, shows only that Congress after 1798 regarded slaves for the purpose of taxation as realty.

It may be rightly affirmed, therefore, that in the practical construction of the Constitution by Congress direct taxes have been limited to taxes on land and appurtenances and taxes on polls or capitation taxes.

And this construction is entitled to great consideration, especially in the absence of anything adverse to it in the discussions of the convention which framed, and of the conventions which ratified, the Constitution.

What does appear in those discussions, on the contrary, supports the construction. Mr. Madison informs us that Mr. King asked what was the precise meaning of direct taxation and no one answered. On another day, when the question of proportioning representation to taxation, and both to the white and three-fifths of the slave inhabitants, was under consideration, Mr. Ellsworth said, "In case of a poll tax there would be no difficulty," and, speaking doubtless of direct taxation, he went on to observe, "The sum allotted to a State may be levied without difficulty, according to the plan used in the State for raising its own supplies." All this doubtless shows uncertainty as to the true meaning of the term direct tax, but it indicates, also, an understanding that direct taxes were such as may be levied by capitation, and on lands and appurtenances, or, perhaps, by valuation and assessment of personal property upon general lists. For these were the subjects from which the States at that time usually raised their principal supplies.

This view received the sanction of this court two years before the enactment of the first law imposing direct taxes eo nomine.

During the February term, 1796, the constitutionality of the act of 1794, imposing a duty on carriages, came under consideration in the case of Hylton v. The United States. Suit was brought by the United States against Daniel Hylton to recover the penalty imposed by the act for not returning and paying duty on a number of carriages, for the conveyance of persons, kept by the defendant for his own use. The law did not provide for the apportionment of the tax, and if it was a direct tax the law was confessedly unwarranted by the Constitution. The only question in the case, therefore, was whether or not the tax was a direct tax.

The case was one of great expectation, and a general interest was felt in its determination. It was argued, in support of the tax, by Lee, Attorney General, and Hamilton, recently Secretary of the Treasury; in opposition to the tax, by Campbell, attorney for the Virginia district, and Ingersoll, attorney general of Pennsylvania.

Of the justices who then filled the bench, Ellsworth, Patterson, and Wilson had been members and conspicuous members of the Constitutional Convention, and each of the three had taken part in the discussions relating to direct taxation. Ellsworth, the Chief Justice, sworn into office that morning, not having heard the whole argument, declined taking part in the decision. Cushing, senior Associate Justice, having been prevented by indisposition from attending to the argument, also refrained from expressing an opinion. The other judges delivered their opinions in succession, the youngest in commission delivering the first and the oldest the last.

They all held that the tax on carriages was not a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution. Chase, Justice, was inclined to think that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution are only two—a capitation or poll tax and a tax on land. He doubted whether a tax by a general assessment of personal property can be included within the term direct tax. Patterson, who had taken a leading part in the Constitutional Convention, went more fully into the sense in which the words giving the power of taxation were used by that body. In the course of this examination he said:

"Whether direct taxes, in the sense of the Constitution, comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and tax on land is a questionable point. If Congress, for instance, should tax, in the aggregate or mass, things that generally pervade all the States in the Union, then, perhaps, the rule of apportionment would be the most proper, especially if an assessment was to intervene. This appears from the practice of some of the States to have been considered as a direct tax. Whether it be so under the Constitution of the United States is a matter of some difficulty, but as it is not before the court it would be improper to give any decisive opinion upon it. I never entertained a doubt that the principal—I will not say the only—objects that the framers of the Constitution contemplated as falling within the rule of apportionment were a capitation tax and a tax on land."

Iredell, J., delivering his opinion at length, concurred generally in the views of Justices Chase and Patterson. Wilson had expressed his opinion to the same general effect when giving the decision upon the circuit, and did not now repeat them. Neither Chief Justice Ellsworth nor Justice Cushing expressed any dissent, and it can not be supposed, if in a case so important their judgments had differed from those announced, that an opportunity would not have been given them by an order for reargument to participate in the decision.

It may be safely assumed, therefore, as the unanimous judgment of the court that a tax on carriages is not a direct tax, and it may be further taken as established upon the testimony of Patterson that the words "direct taxes," as used in the Constitution, comprehended only capitation taxes and taxes on land, and perhaps taxes on personal property, by general valuation and assessment of the various descriptions possessed within the several States.

It follows, necessarily, that the power to tax without apportionment extends to all other objects. Taxes on other objects are included under the heads of taxes not direct, duties, imposts, and excises, and must be laid and collected by the rule of uniformity. The tax under consideration is a tax on bank circulation and may very well be classed under the head of duties. Certainly it is not, in the sense of the Constitution, a direct tax. It may be said to come within the same category of taxation as the tax on income of insurance companies, which this court at the last term, in the case of Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule, held not to be a direct tax.

The next case which arose, to which I will invite your attention, was Scholey v. Rew, reported in 23 Wallace, page 331. The facts were that Scholey sued Rew, who was a collector of internal revenue, to recover the amount of a succession tax which Rew, as collector, had collected and which Scholey had paid on compulsion and under protest. Mr. Justice Clifford, writing the opinion of the court, says:

Questions of importance were discussed at the bar, some of which it can not be admitted are properly presented for decision. Such questions only as are specified in the assignment of errors are in general to be regarded as open to the plaintiff, and it is very doubtful whether an assignment that the decision of the circuit court is for the wrong party is sufficient to present any questions for decision, but inasmuch as the findings of the court in this case are in their nature a special finding the better opinion is that their sufficiency to support the judgment is open to reexamination.

Enough has already appeared to show that the plaintiff took under his wife's will an equitable interest in one-third of the estate in question, and the United States contend that in view of those facts he is liable to pay a succession tax or duty in respect of the same by virtue of the act passed to levy such taxes, as it applies to every past or future disposition of real estate by will, deed, or laws of descent, by reason whereof any person shall become beneficially entitled in possession or expectancy to any real estate or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the passage of that act.

Apply the rule to be deduced from that enactment to the facts found by the court and it must follow that the argument of the United States is well founded, unless some one or more of the special objections to the tax set up by the plaintiff are sufficient to exonerate him from such liability. Those objections are as follows: (1) That the act imposing the duty is unconstitutional and void. (2) That the case is not one within the act imposing the tax or duty. (3) That the plaintiff being an alien, the devise to him is absolutely void.

1. Support to the first objection is attempted to be drawn from the case of the Constitution, which provides that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers; and also from the clause which provides that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or amended enumeration; but it is clear that the tax or duty levied by the act under consideration is not a direct tax within the meaning of either of those provisions. Instead of that it is plainly an excise tax or duty, authorized by section 8 of Article I, which vests the power in Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

Such a tax or duty is neither a tax on land nor a capitation exaction, as subsequently appears from the language of the section imposing the tax or duty, as well as from the preceding section, which provides that the term "succession" shall denote the devolution of real estate; and the section which imposes the tax or duty also contains a corresponding clause which provides that the term "successor" shall denote the person so entitled, and that the term "predecessor" shall denote the grantor, testator, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor has been or shall be derived.

Successor is employed in the act as the correlative to predecessor, and the succession or devolution of the real estate is the subject matter of the tax or duty, or, in other words, it is the right to become the successor of real estate upon the death of the predecessor, whether the devolution or disposition of the same is effected by will, deed, or laws of descent, from a grantor, testator, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor has been or shall be derived; nor is the question affected in the least by the fact that the tax or duty is made a lien upon the land, as the lien is merely an appropriate regulation to secure the collection of the exaction.

Indirect taxes, such as duties of imposts and excises and every other description of the same, must be uniform, and direct taxes must be laid in proportion to the census or enumeration as remodeled in the fourteenth amendment. Taxes on lands, houses, and other permanent real estate have always been deemed to be direct taxes, and capitation taxes, by the express words of the Constitution, are within the same category, but it never has been decided that any other legal exactions for the support of the Federal Government fall within the condition that unless laid in proportion to numbers that the assessment is invalid.

Whether direct taxes in the sense of the Constitution comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and a tax on land is a question not absolutely decided, nor is it necessary to determine it in the present case, as it is expressly decided that the term does not include the tax on income, which can not be distinguished in principle from a succession tax such as the one involved in the present controversy.

Neither duties nor excises were regarded as direct taxes by the authors of the Federalist. Objection was made to the power to impose such taxes, and in answering that objection Mr. Hamilton said that the proportion of these taxes is not to be left to the discretion of the National Legislature, but it is to be determined by the numbers of each State, as described in the second section of the first article. An actual census or enumeration of the people must furnish the rule, a circumstance which shuts the door to partiality or oppression. In addition to the precaution just mentioned, said he, there is a provision that all duties of imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Exactions for the support of the Government may assume the form of duties, imposts, or excises, or they may also assume the form of license fees for permission to carry on particular occupations or to enjoy special franchises, or they may be specific in form, as when levied upon corporations in reference to the amount of capital stock or to the business done or profits earned by the individual or corporation.

In other words, whether the descriptions of direct taxes were limited to land or capitation, he said, was not expressly decided, but it is expressly decided that the term does not include a tax on income, and that income can not be distinguished from a succession tax, such as was sustained in this particular case.

Now, you have the carriage tax, the tax on bank circulation, the tax on income, the tax on successions, each sustained in order in 1796, in 1861, in 1864, and in 1874. All of these are different in character. What could be closer to real estate than a tax on the right to take under the devolution of title, with a lien upon the property, to secure the payment of the tax? If a direct tax is a tax on land, how much nearer can you come to a tax upon real estate than to say, "I will tax the passage of the title, and I will make a lien on the property to secure payment of the tax"? Justice Clifford in this case said that while he would not contend that it was clearly settled that land and capitation were the only direct taxes, it was settled that an income tax was an indirect tax, and he sustained the succession tax on the ground that it was not different from an income tax.

You all recall the Springer case, he having been a Member of Congress, and recall that he refused to pay an income tax assessed against him under the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat., 218), as amended by the act of March 3, 1865 (Id., 469), he having no goods or chattels known to the proper officers out of which the tax and penalty could have been made. The United States levied upon his homestead, which was sold and bought in by the United States, and an action in ejectment was brought against him. Mr. Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said:

The central and controlling question in this case is whether the tax which was levied on the income, gains, and profits of the plaintiff in error, as set forth in the record, and by pretended virtue of the acts of Congress and parts of acts therein mentioned, is a direct tax. It is fundamental with respect to the rights of the parties and the result of the case. It will be last considered. Many of the other points made by the plaintiff in error reproduce the same thing in different forms of language. They will all be responded to without formally restating any of them. This will conduce to brevity without sacrificing clearness and will not involve the necessary omission of anything proper to be said.

The plaintiff in error advises us by his elaborate brief "that on the trial of the case below the proceedings were merely formal" and that "no arguments or briefs were submitted, and only such proceedings were had as were necessary to prepare the case for the Supreme Court."

This accounts for the numerous defects in the record as a whole. It was doubtless intended that only the question presented in the first of the assignments of error should be considered here. In that respect the record is full and sufficient. Other alleged errors, however, have been pressed upon our attention and we must dispose of them.

There is clearly a misrecital in the deed of one of the acts of Congress to which it refers. By the act of the 30th of March, 1864, was clearly meant the act of the 30th of June, in the same year. There is no act relating to internal revenue of the former date.

But the plaintiff in error can not avail himself of this fact, for several reasons.

The point was not brought to the attention of the court below and can not, therefore, be insisted upon. It comes within the rule falsa demonstratio non nocet. It was the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1864, that was in force when the tax was assessed. The latter act took effect April 1, 1865, and declared that "the duty herein provided for shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said duties."

The tax was assessed for the year 1865 in the spring of 1866, under the act of 1865, according to the requirements of that act; and we find upon examination that the assessment was in all things correct. (13 Stat., pp. 469, 479.) The criticism of the plaintiff in error in this regard is, therefore, without foundation.

The proceedings of the collector were not in conflict with the amendment to the Constitution which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The power to distrain personal property for the payment of taxes is almost as old as the common law. (Cooley, Taxation, p. 302.) The Constitution gives to Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." Except as to exports, no limit to the exercise of power is prescribed. In McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., p. 316), Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "The power to tax involves the power to destroy." Why is it not competent for Congress to apply to realty as well as to personalty the power to distrain and sell when necessary to enforce the payment of a tax? It is only the further legitimate exercise of the same power for the same purpose. In Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. (18 How., p. 274) this court held that an act of Congress authorizing a warrant to issue, without oath, against a public debtor, for the seizure of his property was valid; that the warrant was conclusive evidence of the fact is cited in it, and that the proceeding was "due process of law" in that case. (See also De Treville v. Smalls, 98 U. S., p. 517; Sherry v. McKinley, 99 id., p. 419; Miller v. United States, 11 Wall., p. 216; Tyler v. Defrees, id., p. 331.)

The prompt payment of taxes is always important to the public welfare. It may be vital to the existence of a government. The idea that every taxpayer is entitled to the delays of litigation is unreasonable. If the law here in question involved any wrong or unnecessary harshness, it was for Congress, or the people who make Congresses, to see that the evil was corrected. The remedy does not lie with the judicial branch of the Government.

The statute of Illinois had no application to the point whether the premises should be sold by the collector en masse or in two or more parcels. The fact that the house was on one lot and the barn on the other, that the whole was surrounded by a common inclosure, and that the entire property was occupied as a single homestead rendered it not improper for the collector to make the sale as it was made. No suspicion of bad faith attaches to him. He was clothed with a discretion, and it is to be presumed that he exercised it both fairly and well. (Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall., 44.)

Certainly the contrary does not appear. If the tax was not a direct tax, the instructions given by the court, brief as they were, covered the whole case and submitted it properly to the jury.

The plaintiff in error was entitled to nothing more. The fourth instruction which he asked for was liable to several fatal objections. It was too general and indefinite. It left for the jury to decide what were the "indispensable preliminaries" required by the law and Constitution in the numerous particulars specified. It referred to matters which the attention of the court below does not appear to have been called, and in regard to which, if this had been done, the requisite proof would doubtless have been supplied. It falls within the principle of the rule so often applied by this court—that where instructions are asked in a mass, if one of them be wrong the whole may be rejected. The record does not purport to give all the testimony, and its defects are doubtless largely due to the mode in which the case was tried and the single object, already stated, which the parties then had in view. The instruction was properly refused.

To grant or refuse a new trial was a matter within the discretion of the court. That it was refused and can not be assigned for error here.

Several other minor points have been earnestly argued by the learned plaintiff in error, but as they are all within the category of not having been taken in the court below, we need not more particularly advert to them.

This brings us to the examination of the main question in the case.

The clauses of the Constitution bearing on the subject are as follows:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number those bound to service for a term of years and, excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. * * * No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census hereinbefore directed to be taken."

Was the tax here in question a direct tax? If it was, not having been laid according to the requirements of the Constitution, it must be admitted that the laws imposing it and the proceedings taken under them by the assessor and collector for its imposition and collection were all void.

Many of the provisions of the Articles of Confederation of 1777 were embodied in the existing organic law. They provided for a common treasury and the mode of supplying it with funds. The latter was by requisitions upon the several States. The delays and difficulties in procuring the compliance of the States, it is known, was one of the causes that led to the adoption of the present Constitution. This clause of the articles throws no light on the question we are called upon to consider, nor does the journal of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787 contain anything of much value relating to the subject.

It appears that on the 11th of July in that year there was a debate of some warmth involving the topic of slavery. On the day following Gouverneur Morris, of New York, submitted a proposition "that taxation shall be in proportion to representation." It is further recorded in this day's proceedings that Mr. Morris, having so varied his motion by inserting the word "direct," it passed nem. con., as follows: "Provided always, That direct taxes ought to be proportioned to representation." (2 Madison Papers, by Gilpin, pp. 1079–1081.)

On the 24th of the same month M. Morris said that "he hoped the committee would strike out the whole clause. * * * He had only meant it as a bridge to assist us over a gulf; having passed the gulf, the bridge may be removed. He thought the principle laid down with so much strictness liable to strong objections." (Id., 1197.) The gulf was the share of representation claimed by the Southern States on account of their slave population. But the bridge remained. The builder could not remove it, much as he desired to do so. All parties seemed thereafter to have avoided the subject. With one or two immaterial exceptions not necessary to be noted it does not appear that it was again adverted to in any way. It was silently incorporated into the draft of the Constitution as that instrument was finally adopted.

It does not appear that an attempt was made by anyone to define the exact meaning of the language employed.

In the twenty-first number of the Federalist, Alexander Hamilton, speaking of taxes generally, said: "Those of the direct kind which principally relate to land and buildings may admit of a rule of apportionment. Either the value of the land or the number of the people may serve as a standard." The thirty-sixth number of that work, by the same author, is devoted to the subject of internal taxes. It is there said: "They may be subdivided into those of the direct and those of the indirect kind." In this connection the land taxes and poll taxes are discussed. The former are commended and the latter are condemned. Nothing is said of any other direct tax. In neither case is there a definition given or attempted of the phrase "direct tax."

The very elaborate researches of the plaintiff in error have furnished us with nothing from the debates of State conventions, by whom the Constitution was adopted, which gives us any aid. Hence, we may safely assume that no such material exists in that direction, though it is known that Virginia proposed to Congress an amendment relating to the subject, and that Massachusetts, South Carolina, New York, and North Carolina expressed strong disapprobation of the power given to impose such burdens. (1 Tucker's Blackstone, pt. 1, app. 235.)

Perhaps the two most authoritative persons in the convention touching the Constitution were Hamilton and Madison. The latter, in a letter of May 11, 1794, speaking of the tax which was adjudicated upon in Hylton v. United States (3 Dall., 171), said: "The tax on carriages succeeded in spite of the Constitution by a majority of 20, the advocates of the principle being reenforced by the adversaries of luxury." (2 Madison's Writings (pub. by Cong.), p. 14.) In another letter of the 7th of February, 1796, referring to the case of Hylton v. United States, then pending, he remarked: "There never was a question on which my mind was better satisfied, and yet I have very little expectation that it will be viewed in the same light by the court that it is by me." (Id., 77.) Whence the despondency thus expressed is unexplained.

Hamilton left behind him a series of legal briefs, and among them one entitled "Carriage Tax." (See vol. 7, p. 848, of his works.) This paper was evidently prepared with a view to the Hylton case, in which he appeared as one of the counsel for the United States. In it he says: "What is the distinction between direct and indirect taxes? It is a matter of regret that terms so uncertain and vague in so important a point are to be found in the Constitution. We shall seek in vain for any antecedent settled legal meaning to the respective terms. There is none. We shall be as much at loss to find any disposition of either which can satisfactorily determine the point." There being many carriages in some of the States and very few in others, he points out the preposterous consequences if such a tax be laid and collected on the principle of apportionment instead of the rule of uniformity. He insists that if the tax there in question was a direct tax, so would be a tax on ships according to their tonnage. He suggests that the boundary line between direct and indirect taxes be settled by "a series of arbitrations" and that direct taxes be held to be only "capitation or poll taxes, and taxes on lands and buildings and general assessments, whether on the whole property of individuals or on their whole real or personal estate. All else must of necessity be considered as indirect taxes."

The tax here in question falls within neither of these categories. It is not a tax on the whole * * * personal estate of the individual, but only on his income, gains, and profits during the year, which may have been but a small part of his personal estate, and in most cases would have been so. This classification lends no support to the argument of the plaintiff in error.

The Constitution went into operation on the 4th of March, 1789.

It is important to look into the legislation of Congress touching the subject since that time. The following summary will suffice for our purpose. We shall refer to the several acts of Congress, to be examined according to their sequence in dates. In all of them the aggregate amount required to be collected was apportioned among the several States:

The act of July 14, 1798 (ch. 75, 1 Stat., 53). This act imposed a tax upon real estate and a capitation tax upon slaves.

The act of August 2, 1813 (ch. 37, 3 id., 53). By this act the tax was imposed upon real estate and slaves, according to their respective values in money.

The act of January 19, 1815 (ch. 21, id. 164). This act imposed a tax upon the same descriptions of property and in like manner as the preceding act.

The act of February 27, 1815 (ch. 60, id. 216), applied to the District of Columbia the provisions of the act of January 19, 1815.

The act of March 5, 1816 (ch. 24, id. 255), repealed the two preceding acts and reenacted their provisions to enforce the collection of the smaller amount of tax thereby prescribed.

The act of August 5, 1861 (chs. 45, 12, id. 294), required the tax to be levied wholly on real estate.

The act of June 7, 1862 (ch. 98, id. 422), and the act of February 6, 1863 (ch. 21, id. 640), both relate only to the collection in insurrectionary districts of the direct tax imposed by the act of August 5, 1861, and need not therefore be more particularly noticed.

It will thus be seen that whenever the Government has imposed a tax which is recognized as a direct tax it has never been applied to any objects but real estate and slaves. The latter application may be accounted for upon two grounds: First, in some of the States slaves were regarded as real estate (1 Hurd. Slavery, 239; Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall., 533); and, second, such an extension of the tax lessened the burden upon the real estate where slavery existed, while the result to the National Treasury was the same, whether the slaves were omitted or included. The wishes of the South were, therefore, allowed to prevail. We are not aware that the question of the validity of such a tax was ever presented for adjudication. Slavery having passed away, it can not hereafter arise. It does not appear that any tax like the one here in question was ever regarded or treated by Congress as a direct tax. This uniform practical construction of the Constitution, touching so important a point, through so long a period, by the legislative and executive departments of the Government, though not conclusive, is a consideration of great weight.

There are four adjudications by this court to be considered. They have an important, if not a conclusive, application to the case in hand. In Hylton v. United States (supra) a tax had been laid upon pleasure carriages. The plaintiff in error insisted that the tax was void, because it was a direct tax and had not been apportioned among the States, as required by the Constitution, where such taxes are imposed. The case was argued on both sides by counsel of eminence and ability. It was heard and determined by four judges—Wilson, Paterson, Chase, and Iredell. The three first named had been distinguished members of the Constitutional Convention. Wilson was on the committee that reported the completed draft of the instrument and warmly advocated its adoption in the State convention of Pennsylvania. The fourth was a member of the convention of North Carolina that adopted the Constitution. The case was decided in 1795. The judges were unanimous. The tax was held not to be a direct tax. Each judge delivered a separate opinion. Their judgment stood on the ground indicated by Mr. Justice Chase in the following extract from his opinion:

"It appears to me that a tax on carriages can not be laid by the rule of apportionment without very great inequality and injustice. For example, suppose two States, equal in census, to pay $80,000 each by a tax on carriages of $8 on every carriage, and in one State there are 100 carriages and in the other 1,000, the owners of carriages in one State would pay 10 times the tax of owners in the other. A, in one State, would pay for his carriage $8; but B, in the other State, would pay for his carriage $80."

It was well held that where such evils would attend the apportionment of a tax the Constitution could not have intended that an apportionment should be made. This view applies with even greater force to the tax in question in this case. Where the population is large and the incomes are few and small, it would be intolerably oppressive.

The difference in the ability of communities, without reference to numbers, to pay any taxes is forceably remarked upon by McCulloh in his article on taxation in the Encyclopedia Brittanica, volume 21 (old ed.), page 75.

Mr. Justice Chase said, further, that he would give no judicial opinion upon the subject, but that he was inclined to think that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution were only two—a capitation tax and a tax on land.

Mr. Justice Iredell said: "Perhaps a direct tax, in the sense of the Constitution, can mean nothing but a tax on something inseparably annexed to the soil. * * * A land or poll tax may be considered of this description. The latter is to be so considered, particularly under the present Constitution, on account of the slaves in the Southern States, who give a ratio in the representation in the proportion of three to five."

Mr. Justice Paterson said he never entertained a doubt that the principal, he would not say the only, object contemplated by the Constitution as falling within the rule of apportionment were a capitation tax and a tax on land. From these views the other judges expressed no dissent.

"Ellsworth, the Chief Justice, sworn into office that morning, not having heard the whole argument, declined taking part in the decision." (8 Wall., 545.) Cushing, from ill health, did not sit in the case. It has been remarked that if they had been dissatisfied with the result, the question involved being so important, doubtless a reargument would have been had.

In Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule (7 Wall., 433) the taxes in question were upon the receipts of such companies from premiums and assessments and from all sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent fund. This court held unanimously that the taxes were not direct taxes, and that they were valid.

In the Veazie Bank v. Fenno (supra) the tax which came under consideration was one of 10 per cent upon the notes of State banks paid out by other banks, State or national. The same conclusions were reached by the court as in the preceding case. Mr. Chief Justice Chase delivered the opinion of the court. In the course of his elaborate examination of the subject he said: "It may be rightly affirmed that, in the practical construction of the Constitution by Congress, direct taxes have been limited to taxes on land and appurtenances, and taxes on polls, or capitation taxes."

In Scholey v. Rew (23 Wall., 331) the tax involved was a succession tax, imposed by the acts of Congress of June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866. It was held that the tax was not a direct tax, and that it was constitutional and valid. In delivering the opinion of the court Mr. Justice Clifford, after remarking that the tax there in question was not a direct tax, said: "Instead of that it is plainly an excise tax or duty, authorized by section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which vests the power in Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and public welfare."

He said further: "Taxes on houses, lands, and other permanent real estate have always been deemed to be direct taxes, and capitation taxes, by the express words of the Constitution, are within the same category; but it has never been decided that any other legal exactions for the support of the Federal Government fall within the condition that unless laid in proportion to numbers the assessment is invalid."

All these cases are indistinguishable in principle from the case now before us, and they are decisive against the plaintiff in error.

The question, What is a direct tax? is one exclusively in American jurisprudence. The text writers of the country are in entire accord on the subject.

Mr. Justice Story says all taxes are usually divided into two classes, those which are direct and those which are indirect, and that "under the former denomination are included taxes on land or real property and under the latter taxes on consumption." (1 Const., sec. 950.)

Chancellor Kent, speaking of the case of Hylton v. United States, says: "The better opinion seemed to be that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution were only two, viz, a capitation or poll tax and a tax upon land." (1 Com., 257. See also Cooley, Taxation, p. 5, note 2; Pomeroy, Const. Law, 157; Sharswood's Blackstone, 308, note; Rawle, Const., 30; Sergeant, Const., 305.)

We are not aware that any writer since Hylton v. United States was decided has expressed a view of the subject different from that of these authors.

Our conclusions are that direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution are only capitation taxes as expressed in that instrument and taxes on real estate, and that the tax of which the plaintiff in error complains is within the category of an excise or duty. (Pomeroy, Con. Lad, 177; Pac. Ins. Co. v. Soule and Scholey v. Rew, supra.)

Against the considerations in one scale in favor of these propositions what has been placed in the other as a counterpoise? Our answer is, Certainly nothing of such weight, in our judgment, as to require any special reply.

The numerous citations from the writing of foreign political economists made by the plaintiff in error are sufficiently answered by Hamilton in his brief before referred to.

This decision, rendered in October, 1880, was a little less than a hundred years after the decision in the case of Hylton v. United States. It was incontestible from the authority in the Springer case that a tax levied upon an income was constitutional, and this decision is supported by a hundred years of judicial and legislative construction. No man dreamed that any differentiation could be made as to the Springer case until one was made in the Pollock case in 1894. And what was the differentiation? It was to the effect that a tax had always been justified upon professions and that the particular tax in question was an occupation tax so far as Springer was concerned, and that therefore the real thing decided by Mr. Justice Swayne in the case which I have just read ought to have been that as Springer was pursuing an occupation, and as the tax of 1861 was also an occupation tax, the extent of this authority, and the sole extent, was to justify the levying of an occupation tax. That is how the Supreme Court in the Pollock case got rid of the Springer case, which I have just submitted to you. [Applause.]

I refer you to one other case, that of Nichol v. Ames (173 U. S., 508), as indicating what the courts are determined to do one of these days with the Pollock case. I do not wish to be understood as claiming the right to rail at the judiciary, but I do wish to be understood as claiming the right here, in a case where three-fourths of the taxing power of the Federal Government has been struck down by one decision, where a great political sovereignty is involved, and where the question of whether the wealth of the Nation shall come under the taxing power of the United States—I do wish to be understood as saying that so far as my humble research goes there never was a suggestion that an income tax could not be sustained until 1894, and there has never been a reaffirmance of that, but, on the contrary, a limitation upon it since 1894, so far as the decisions go. [Applause.]

We have now traveled over a period of more than 100 years of judicial and legislative construction. We have inquired into the sources of contemporaneous interpretation. We have turned over the pages of the debates in the Constitutional Convention. We have witnessed the exercise of the taxing power by the Government directly upon carriages, as personal property, upon incomes of insurance companies, upon the circulation of State banks, upon the devolution of real estate under a succession tax, and finally we have witnessed the full and undisturbed power of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, exerted directly upon the incomes covered by the acts of 1861. We have witnessed the laborious research of a long line of brilliant and distinguished judges, beginning in the case of Hilton against United States and ending with the case of Springer against United States. We have gone to the pages of the text writers. We have had a glimpse of the abstruse theories of the economist, and from all of these sources, gathering together all of the light which breaks out from any and all of these interpretations and letting it shine directly upon the provisions of the Constitution and the history of its meaning, we are unable to find a single challenge or question as to the power of the Government to tax incomes under the rule of uniformity until we come across the now celebrated case of Pollock against Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. That case, as all are now well aware, arose under sections 27 to 37, inclusive, of the act of Congress entitled "An act to reduce taxation and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law in August, 1894, by which it was provided:

> There shall be assessed, levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income received in the preceding calendar year by every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, and every person residing therein, whether said gains, profits, or income be derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of 2 per cent on the amount so derived over and above $4,000, and a like tax shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income from all property owned and of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing without the United States.

This case was most exhaustively presented to the Supreme Court of the United States on behalf of the Government, as well as on behalf of the contestant. Participating on the presentation of that great case were such leaders of the bar as the late James C. Carter, who held the primacy of the bar of New York and whose arguments in favor of the validity of the income tax have not yet and will not be surpassed for solid and unanswerable reasoning.

Joseph H. Choate appeared as a contestant of the validity of the law, and all of the ability and brilliant qualities which have marked his illustrious career at the bar were drawn upon on this occasion. Mr. Guthrie, then a very young man at the bar, gave his clear and unclouded mind for weeks and months to the study of the questions involved in an effort to prove the invalidity of the statute. The Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Olney, brought to the presentation of the Government's case the wealth of learning and restraint of culture and the simplicity of utterance which had put him at the front of American advocates. It is a significant fact, which ought not to be overlooked, that Mr. James C. Carter, undoubtedly the most accomplished of advocates in that great legal struggle, called attention to the fact that its adversaries had no hope of persuading the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse the long and unvarying line of decisions of 100 years; called attention also to the fact that they had no hope of having the great court hold that direct taxes were any other than taxes on land and capitation, and pointed out that what his adversaries wished to have the court determine was that, although the income tax was indirect, it did not comply with the rule of uniformity as used in the Constitution and meant personal uniformity and equality and not geographical uniformity. If we could restore the scene and explore the minds of the actors in that great struggle and could reestablish the atmosphere we would see that Mr. Carter's analysis of the real contention of the other side was the true one, and that the whole problem, as he conceived it, was to be determined upon the rule of uniformity.

After the case had been so exhaustively argued, Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court, reviewing at great length and with particular pains the debates in the Constitutional Convention and adverted to the various authorities, state papers, and public documents bearing on the question involved, and finally concluded with a statement of the decision of the court as follows:

> We are of opinion that the law in question, so far as it levies a tax on the rents or income of real estate, is in violation of the Constitution and is invalid.

He then discussed the validity of the law in so far as it lays a tax on incomes derived upon municipal bonds, and in this connection said:

> As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States have no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentality or the property of a State.

He then quoted from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Weston v. Charleston (2 Pet., 449, 468):

> The tax on Government stock is thought by this court to be a tax on the contract, a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and consequently repugnant to the United States.

Applying this language to these municipal securities the court said:

> It is obvious that taxation on the interest therefrom would operate on the power to borrow before it is exercised, and would have a sensible influence on the contract, and that the tax in question is a tax on the power of the States and their instrumentalities to borrow money, and consequently repugnant to the Constitution.

Finally the Chief Justice states the decision of the court on the remaining questions as follows:

> Upon each of the other questions argued at the bar, to wit: 1. Whether the void provisions as to rents and incomes from real estate invalidated the whole act? 2. Whether, as to the income from personal property as such, the act is unconstitutional as laying direct taxes? 3. Whether any part of the tax, if not considered as a direct tax, is invalid for want of uniformity on either of the grounds suggested?—the justices who heard the argument are equally divided, and, therefore, no opinion is expressed.

From this opinion Mr. Justice White, with whom Mr. Justice Harlan concurred, dissented in an opinion now notable in the literature of the law.

Thus, after the decision in the first Pollock case the Supreme Court of the United States stood equally divided on the meaning, intent, and purpose of section 8, Article I of the Constitution, as well as section 9 of the same article, except in so far as it related to the income from real estate and from municipal bonds. The question of whether personal property could be taxed, or the income from personal property, and the question of uniformity were left unsettled.

Thereafter, on April 15, 1895, all of the counsel for appellants joined in a petition to the Supreme Court for a rehearing of the case, and this was supported by a separate petition presented by the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Richard Olney, which differed only in that the Attorney General asked that the rehearing be had in such a way as to embrace all of the questions involved in the case. Thereafter, on May 6, 1895, the Chief Justice ordered that a rehearing should be had, and accordingly counsel for all parties again and with much elaboration and detail presented to the court their views. The Chief Justice again delivered the opinion of the court on the rehearing, and concluded that opinion as follows:

> First. We adhere to the opinion already announced, that taxes on real estate, being indisputably direct taxes, taxes on the rents or income of real estate are equally direct taxes.
> Second. We are of opinion that taxes on personal property or on the income of personal property are likewise direct taxes.
> Third. The tax imposed by sections 27 to 37, inclusive, of the act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property, being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and, therefore, unconstitutional and void because not apportioned according to representation, all of those sections, constituting one entire scheme of taxation, are necessarily invalid.

It is worth remembering in connection with the pending bill that the Chief Justice said in the course of his opinion that the court had considered the act only in respect to the tax on income derived on real estate and invested personal property and did not comment on so much of it as bears on gains or profits from business, privileges, or employments, in view of the circumstances in which taxation on business, privileges, or employments have assumed the guise of an excise tax and been sustained as such.

From the prevailing opinion of the court Mr. Justice Harlan in a very vigorous decision dissented; Mr. Justice White dissented; Mr. Justice Jackson dissented; and Mr. Justice Brown dissented. And I believe I am well within the limits of moderation when I say that the entire bar of this country, viewing the question as a constitutional and legal one solely, are practically unanimous—where they have investigated the subject—that the four dissenting opinions presented the better side of the controversy, were more in accord with authority, more supported by reason, more sustained by history, and represented the true exposition of the meaning of the Constitution. So far as the political effects of this decision are concerned—what its fruits were in the heat and friction of the public forum, what effect it has had in shaping our economic policies, what disturbance, if any, it has brought in the minds of the people generally I shall not undertake to discuss.

As reflecting the views of the Supreme Court after the decision of the Pollock case, I wish to refer you to the case of Nichol v. Ames in One hundred and seventy-third United States, which contains language the significance of which can not escape your observation. The case arose under the provisions of section 6 and a portion of Schedule A of an act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, chapter 448, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," which provided as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, for and in respect of the several bonds, debentures, or certificates of stock and of indebtedness, and other documents, instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in Schedule A of this act, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them, shall be written or printed by any person or persons or party who shall make, sign, or issue the same, or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, signed, or issued, the several taxes or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively, or otherwise specified or set forth in the said schedule. * * * Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell any products or merchandise at any exchange or board of trade or other similar place, either for present or future delivery, for each $100 in value of said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 1 cent; and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 1 cent.

The question arose out of transactions upon the stock exchange, and Mr. Justice Peckham, after stating the facts, delivered the opinion of the court, which was as follows:

The objections to the validity of the act are stated generally that it is a direct tax, and is illegal because not apportioned as required by the Constitution. If an indirect tax, it is a stamp tax on documents not required to be made under State law in order to render the sale valid, and Congress has no power to require a written memorandum to be made of transactions within the State for the purpose of placing a stamp thereon. It is not a privilege tax within the meaning of that term, because there is no privilege other than that which every man has to transact his own business in his own house or in his own office under such regulations as he may choose to adopt, and such a choice can not be in any fair use of the term a privilege which is subject to taxation.

These questions are involved in each case, while in the last one it is further objected that the sales of the stockyards are not included in the terms of the act, and evidence was adduced upon the trial as to the nature of the business conducted at the stockyards and the manner in which it was performed. It will be adverted to hereafter when we come to a discussion of the meaning and proper construction of the act.

It is always an exceedingly grave and delicate duty to decide upon the constitutionality of an act of the Congress of the United States. The presumption, as has frequently been said, is in favor of the validity of the act, and it is only when the question is free from any reasonable doubt that the court should hold an act of the lawmaking power of the Nation to be in violation of that fundamental instrument upon which all the powers of the Government rest. This is particularly true of a revenue act of Congress. The provisions of such an act should not be lightly or unadvisedly set aside, although if they be plainly antagonistic to the Constitution, it is the duty of the court to so declare. The power to tax is the one great power upon which the whole national fabric is based. It is as necessary to the existence and prosperity of a nation as is the air he breathes to the natural man. It is not only the power to destroy, but it is also the power to keep alive.

This necessary authority is given to Congress by the Constitution. It has power from that instrument to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, and the only constitutional restraint upon the power is that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration directed to be taken, and no tax or duty can be laid on articles exported from any State. (Constitution, Art. I, secs. 8 and 9, subdivs. 4 and 5.) As thus guarded, the whole power of taxation rests with Congress.

The commands of the Constitution in this as in all other respects must be obeyed; direct taxes must be apportioned, while indirect taxes must be uniform throughout the United States. But while yielding implicit obedience to these constitutional requirements it is no part of the duty of this court to lessen, impede, or obstruct the exercise of the taxing power by merely abstruse and subtle distinctions as to the particular nature of a specified tax, where such distinction rests more upon the differing theories of political economists than upon the practical nature of the tax itself.

In deciding upon the validity of a tax, with reference to these requirements, no miscroscopic examination as to the purely economic or theoretical nature of the tax should be indulged in for the purpose of placing it in a category which would invalidate the tax. As a mere abstract scientific or economical problem a particular tax might possibly be regarded as a direct tax, when as a practical matter pertaining to the actual operation of the tax it might quite plainly appear to be indirect. Under such circumstances, and while varying and disputable theories might be indulged as to the real nature of the tax, a court would not be justified, for the purpose of invalidating the tax, in placing it in a class different from that to which its practical results would consign it. Taxation is eminently practical, and is in fact brought to every man's door, and for the purpose of deciding upon its validity a tax should be regarded in its actual, practical results rather than with reference to those theoretical or abstract ideas whose correctness is the subject of dispute and contradiction among those who are experts in the science of political economy.

In searching for proper subjects of taxation to raise moneys for the support of the Government Congress must have the right to recognize the manner in which the business of the country is actually transacted, how among other things the exchange of commodities is affected, what facilities for the conduct of business exist, what is their nature, and how they operate, and what, if any, practical and recognizable distinctions there may be between a transaction which is effected by means of using certain facilities and one where such facilities are not availed of by the parties to the same kind of a transaction. Having the power to recognize these various facts, it must also follow that Congress is justified, if not compelled in framing a statute relating to taxation, to legislate with direct reference to the existing conditions of trade and business throughout the whole country, and to the manner in which they are carried on.

Coming to a consideration of the objections raised to this statute it is well to first consider the nature of an exchange or board of trade, and then to inquire more in detail as to the validity of the act with reference to sales at such places. The Chicago Board of Trade may be taken as a type of the others in existence throughout the country because the same features exist in all of them, while the size and importance of the Chicago instituitons serve only to make such features more prominent and their effect more easily discernible. We say the same features exist in all of the exchanges or boards of trade because we have the right to consider facts without particular proof to them which are universally recognized and which relate to the common and ordinary way of doing business throughout the country, and while we could not take notice without proof, as to any particular constitution or by-law of a body of this description, yet we are not thereby cut off from knowledge of the general nature of those bodies and of the manner generally in which business therein is conducted.

It appears in this record that the Chicago Board of Trade is a voluntary association of individuals who meet together at a certain building owned by the association for the purpose of there transacting business. This particular board is incorporated under an act of the Legislature of Illinois, though its corporate character does not, in our judgment, form a material consideration in the inquiry. The members of the association meet daily, between certain business hours, for the purpose of buying and selling flour, wheat, corn, oats, and other articles of food products, and for the transaction of such other business as is incident thereto. Among its members are some whose business it is to purchase in the country or to receive on consignment from persons in the country some or all of the articles which are dealt in on the floor of the exchange, and there are other members whose business it is to buy such articles upon the exchange, either for themselves or on commission, and to deliver or ship the same to consumers or distributers throughout the country and in Europe.

It is common knowledge that these exchanges encourage and promote honest and fair dealing among their members; that they provide penalties for the violation of their rules in that regard; and that contracts between members relating to business on the exchange have the advantage of the sanction provided by the exchange for such purposes. They furnish a meeting place for those engaged in the purchase and sale of commodities or other things to be sold, and in that way they offer facilities for market for them. Dealings among members so engaged tend to establish the market price of the articles they deal in, and that price is very apt to be the price for the same article when bought or sold outside. The price is arrived at by offers to sell on the one side and to purchase on the other, until, by what has frequently been termed the "higgling" of the market, a price is agreed upon and the sales are accomplished. In arriving at this price of course the great law of the cost of production and also that of supply and demand enter into the problem, and it is upon a consideration of all matters regarded as material that the agreement to buy and sell is made. The prices thus fixed are usually followed when the transaction occurs outside, and the market price means really the exchange price. That an enormous amount of the business of the country which is engaged in the distribution of the commodities grown or produced therein is transacted and takes place through the medium of the boards of trade or exchanges can not be doubted. Nor is there any doubt that these exchanges facilitate transactions of purchase and sale, and it would seem that such facilities or privileges, even though not granted by the Government or by a State, ought nevertheless to be recognized as existing facts and to be subject to the judgment of Congress as fit matters for taxation.

We will now examine the several objections that have been offered to this statute.

It may be stated, of course, that if the tax herein is a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution it is void, for there is no apportionment as required by that instrument.

It is asserted to be a direct tax because it is a tax upon the sale of property measured by the value of the thing sold, and such a tax is a direct tax upon the property itself, and therefore subject to the rule of apportionment. Various cases are cited, from Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419) down to those involving the validity of the income tax (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601), for the purpose of proving the correctness of this proposition. All the cases involve the question whether the taxes to which objection was taken amounted to practically a tax on the property. If this tax is not on the property or on the sale thereof, then these cases do not apply.

We think the tax is in effect a duty or excise laid upon the privilege, opportunity, or facility offered at boards of trade or exchanges for the transaction of the business mentioned in the act. It is not a tax upon the business itself which is so transacted, but it is a duty upon the facilities made use of and actually employed in the transaction of the business, and separate and apart from the business itself. It is not a tax upon the members of the exchange nor upon membership therein, nor is it a tax upon sales generally. The act limits the tax to sales at any exchange or board of trade or similar place, and its fair meaning is to impose a duty upon those privileges or facilities which are there found and made use of in the sale at such place of any product or merchandise. Whether this facility or privilege is such a thing as can be legally taxed while leaving untaxed all other sales made outside of such places will be discussed further on. At present it is enough to say that the tax is not upon the property sold and can not on that ground be found to be direct. The tax laid in the same act upon a broker's note or memorandum of sale is a separate tax, although it may have reference to the same transaction. It is a tax on the note or memorandum itself where made by a broker, while in the other case the tax, although measured in amount by reference to the value of the thing sold, is in reality upon the privilege or facility used in the transaction or sale. The tax is not a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, but is, as already stated, in the nature of a duty or an excise. The amount of such a tax when imposed in a case like this may be increased or diminished by the extent to which the privilege or facility is used, and it is measured in this act by the value of the property transferred by means of using such privilege or facility, but this does not make the tax a direct one. A tax on professional receipts was recognized by the present Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court on the first hearing of the Income Tax case (157 U. S., 429, 579) as an excise or duty and therefore indirect, while a tax on the income of personalty, he thought, might be regarded as direct. And upon the rehearing (158 U. S., 601) it was distinctly held that the tax on personal property or on the income thereof was a direct tax. This tax is neither a tax on the personal property sold nor upon the income thereof, although its amount is measured by the value of the property that is sold at the exchange or board of trade.

It is also said that the tax is direct because it can not be added to the price of the thing sold and therefore ultimately paid by the consumer. In other words, that it is direct because the owner can not shift the payment of the amount of the tax to someone else. This, however, assumes that the tax is not in the nature of a duty or an excise, but that it is laid directly upon the property sold, which we hold is not the case. It is not laid upon the property at all, nor upon the profits of the sale thereof, nor upon the sale itself, considered separate and apart from the place and the circumstances of the sale.

We do not see that any material difference exists when the sale is for future delivery. The thing agreed to be sold is the same, whether for immediate or future delivery, and the fact that the sale for future delivery may subsequently be carried out by the actual payment of the difference between the agreed and the market price at the time agreed upon for such delivery does not affect the case. The privilege used is the same whether for immediate or future delivery, and the same rule applies to both.

Passing these grounds of objection, it is urged that if this is an indirect tax it is not uniform throughout the United States as required by the Constitution. Sales at an exchange or board of trade, it is said, are singled out for taxation under this act, although they differ in no substantial respect from sales at other places, and there is therefore no just ground for segregating or classifying such sales from those made elsewhere. A sale at an exchange or board of trade, it is claimed, is not a privilege or facility which can justly or ought to be taxed while all other sales at all other places are exempted from taxation, and there is no reasonable ground, therefore, for the assertion that such a tax is uniform within the meaning of the Constitution. It is said not to be uniform because it is unequal, taxing sales at exchanges and exempting all other sales, while at the same time there is no natural basis for any distinction between such sales, the distinction made being purely arbitrary and unreasonable.

This general objection on the ground of want of uniformity is not, in our judgment, well founded. Whether the word "uniform" is to be understood in what has been termed its "geographical" sense, or as meaning uniformity as to all the taxpayers similarly situated with regard to the subject matter of the tax, we think this tax is valid within either meaning of the term. In our judgment a sale and an exchange does form a proper basis for a classification which excludes all sales made elsewhere from taxation.

If it were to be assumed that taxes upon corporate franchises or privileges may be imposed only by the authority that created them, it does not follow that no privilege or facility can be taxed which is not created by the government of a State or by Congress. In order to tax it the privilege or facility must exist in fact, but it is not necessary that it should be created by the Government. The question always is, when a classification is made, whether there is any reasonable ground for it or whether it is only and simply arbitrary, based upon no real distinction and entirely unnatural. (Gulf, Colorado, etc., Railway v. Ellis, 165 U. S., 150–155; Magoun v. Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, 170 U. S., 283, 294.) If the classification be proper and legal, then there is the requisite uniformity in that respect.

A tax upon the privilege of selling property at the exchange and of thus using the facilities there offered in accomplishing the sale differs radically from a tax upon every sale made in any place. The latter tax is really and practically upon property. It takes no notice of any kind of privilege or facility, and the fact of a sale is alone regarded. Although not created by government, this privilege or facility in affecting a sale at an exchange is so distinct and definite in its character and constitutes so clear and plain a difference from a sale elsewhere as to create a reasonable and substantial ground for classification and for taxation when similar sales at other places are untaxed. A sale at an exchange differs from a sale made at a man's private office or on his farm or by a partnership, because, although the subject matter of the sale may be the same in each case, there are at an exchange certain advantages in the way of finding a market, obtaining a price, the saving of time, and in the security of payment and other matters which are more easily obtained there than at an office or upon a farm. To accomplish a sale at one's farm or house or office might and probably would occupy a great deal of time in finding a customer, bringing him to the spot, and agreeing on a price. All this can be done at an exchange in the very shortest time and at the least inconvenience. The market is there, and all that is necessary is to send the commodity. Although a sale is the result in each case and the thing sold may be of the same kind, the difference exists in the means and facilities for accomplishing such sale, and those means and facilities there is no reason for saying may not be taxed, unless all sales are taxed, whether the facilities be used or not.

In this case there is that uniformity which the Constitution requires. The tax or duty is uniform throughout the United States, and it is uniform or, in other words, equal upon all who avail themselves of the privileges or facilities offered at the exchanges, and it is not necessary in order to be uniform that the tax should be levied upon all who make sales of the same kind of things whether at an exchange or elsewhere.

Another objection taken is that Congress taxes only those who make sales and not those who make purchases, and those who sell products or merchandise and not those who sell bonds, stocks, etc. These are discriminations, it is said, which do not follow the rule of uniformity, and hence render the tax void.

A purchase occurs whenever a sale is effected, and to say that a purchaser at an exchange sale must be taxed for the facilities made use of in making the purchase, or else that the tax on the seller is void, is simply to insist upon doubling the tax.

Nor is it necessary to tax the use of the privilege under all circumstances in order to render the tax valid upon its use in particular cases. We see no reason why it should be necessary to tax a privilege whenever it is used for any purpose, or else not to tax it at all. It is not indivisible. A tax upon the privilege when used for one purpose does not require for its validity that the same privilege should also be taxed when used for another and a totally distinct purpose. It may be the same privilege, but when it is used in different cases to accomplish sales of wholly different things, between which there is no relation whatever, one use may be taxed and the other not, and no rule of uniformity will thereby be violated.

It is also objected that there is no power in Congress to require a party selling personal property in the course of commerce within the State to make a written note or memorandum of the contract and to punish him by fine and imprisonment for a failure to do so. If the State does not require a memorandum on a sale, Congress can not in the exercise of the taxing power compel a citizen to make one in order that it may be taxed by the United States.

In holding that the tax under consideration is a tax on the privilege used in making sales at an exchange we thereby hold that it is not a tax upon the memorandum required by the statute upon which the stamp is to be placed. The act does not assume to in any manner interfere with the laws of the State in relation to the contract of sale. The memorandum required does not contain all the essentials of a contract to sell. It need not be signed, and it need not contain the name of the vendee or the terms of payment. The statute does not render a sale void without the memorandum or stamp, which by the laws of the State would otherwise be valid. It does not assume to enact anything in opposition to the law of any State upon the subject of sales. It provides for a written memorandum containing the matters mentioned simply as a means of identifying the sale and for collecting the tax by means of the required stamp, and for that purpose it secures by proper penalties the making of the memorandum. Instead of a memorandum, Congress might have required a sworn report with the proper amount of stamps thereon to be made at certain regular intervals of all sales made subject to the tax. Other means might have been resorted to for the same purpose. Whether the means adopted were the best and most convenient to accomplish that purpose was a question for the judgment of Congress, and its decision must be conclusive in that respect.

The means actually adopted do not illegally interfere with or obstruct the internal commerce of the States, nor are such means a restraint upon that commerce so far as to render the means adopted illegal. That Congress might have adopted some other means for collecting the tax which would prove less troublesome or annoying to the taxpayer can surely be no reason for holding that the method set forth in the act renders the tax invalid. As it has the power to impose the tax, the means to be adopted for its collection within reasonable and rational limits must be a question for Congress alone.

I think no one can read the language of Mr. Justice Peckham in his general observation upon the duty of the court in construing an act of Congress and upon the various objects of taxation without feeling that he had in mind as he wrote these words what can be regarded as nothing less than the judicial misfortune of the opinion in the Pollock case.

Can you not discern in the juridical illumination from the pen of Justice Peckham reference to the Pollock case? Can you see the beginning of the time and the place when the court will begin to write the literature out of which ultimately will come a rearrangement and readjustment of the doctrines of the Pollock case and restore us to the place we occupied for more than a hundred years? [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. What year was that?

Mr. LITTLETON. Eighteen hundred and ninety-eight. This decision, interesting to a degree, finally justified the levying of a tax on the transactions which took place on the exchange and justified it first upon the broad ground that I have already read, and second, on the ground that Congress had the power to select the particular manner in which business was done, and if it chose to take the exchange and to make the levy, it had that right and rested upon that.

In the course of judicial history there arose the case of Knowlton v. Moore, reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth United States, page 41. It was under an act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, which is known as the "war-revenue act," sections 29 and 30 of which provide for the assessment and collection of the particular taxes which are there described. Mr. Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

To determine the issues which arise on this record it is necessary to decide whether the taxes imposed are void because repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and if they will be valid to ascertain and define their true import.

The controversy was thus engendered: Edwin F. Knowlton died in October, 1898, in the borough of Brooklyn, State of New York, where he was domiciled. His will was probated, and the executors named therein were duly qualified. As a preliminary to the assessment of the taxes imposed by the provisions of the statute, the collector of internal revenue demanded of the executors that they make a return showing the amount of the personal estate of the deceased and disclosing the legatees and distributees thereof. The executors, asserting that they were not obliged to make the return because of the unconstitutionality of sections 29 and 30 of the statute, nevertheless complied under protest. The report disclosed that the personal estate was appraised at $2,624,029.63, and afforded full information as to those entitled to take the same. The amount of the tax assessed was the sum of $42,084.67.

1. The provisions of the act of Congress under which it is sought to impose, assess, and collect the said tax or duty are in violation of the provisions of Article I, sections 8 and 9, of the Constitution of the United States, and are therefore void.

2. The legacies to George W. Knowlton, Charlotte A. Batchelor, the Unitarian Church of West Upton, Mass., each amount to less than $10,000 and are not subject to any tax or duty under the said provisions of the said act of Congress, even if such provisions be not unconstitutional and void.

3. The legacy to Eben J. Knowlton, a brother of the testator, amounts to only $100,000, and under the said provisions of the said act should be taxed at the rate of $1.12½ per $100, and not at the rate of $2.25 per $100, even if said act be not unconstitutional and void.

In the statute of August 27, 1894 (28 Stat., 509, c. 349), what was in effect a legacy tax was imposed by the provisions of section 28. (Ib., 553.) The tax was eo nomine an income tax, but was in one respect the legal equivalent of a legacy tax, since among the items going to make up the annual income which was taxed was "money and the value of all personal property acquired by gift or inheritance." This law was not enforced. Its constitutionality was assailed on the ground that the income tax, in so far as it included the income from real estate and personal property, was a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and was void because it had not been apportioned. The contention was twice considered by this court. On the first hearing in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429) it was decided that to the extent that the income taxes included the rentals from real estate the tax was a direct tax on the real estate and was therefore unconstitutional because not apportioned. Upon the question whether the unconstitutionality of the tax on income from real estate rendered it legally impossible to enforce all the other taxes provided by the statute the court was equally divided in opinion. (Ib., 586.) On a rehearing (158 U. S., 601) the previous opinion was adhered to, and it was moreover decided that the tax on income from personal property was likewise direct and that the law imposing such a tax was therefore void because not providing for apportionment. The court said (p. 637):

"Third. The tax imposed by sections 27 to 37, inclusive, of the act of 1894 so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore unconstitutional and void because not apportioned according to representation, all those sections constituting one entire scheme of taxation are necessarily invalid."

The decision that the invalidity of the income tax in the particulars quoted carried with it the other different taxes which were included in income was not predicated upon the unconstitutionality of such other taxes, but solely upon the conclusion that by the statute there was such an inseparable union between the elements of income derived from the revenues of real estate and personal property and the other constituents of income provided in the statute that they could not be divided. The court said (p. 637):

"We do not mean to say that an act laying by apportionment a direct tax on all real estate and personal property, or the income thereof, might not also lay excise taxes on business, privileges, employments, and vocations. But this is not such an act, and the scheme must be considered as a whole. Being invalid as to the greater part, and falling, as the tax would, if any part were held valid, in a direction which could not have been contemplated except in connection with the taxation considered as an entirety, we are constrained to conclude that sections 27 to 37, inclusive, of the act, which may become a law without the signature of the President on August 28, 1894, are wholly inoperative and void."

Further on in his opinion Mr. Justice White discusses the question of whether the Pollock case overruled the case of Scholey v. Rew, and says:

The precise meaning of the law being thus determined, the question whether the tax which it imposes is direct, and hence subject to the requirement of apportionment, arises for consideration. That death duties, generally, have been from the beginning in all countries considered as different from taxes levied on property, real or personal, directly on account of the ownership and possession thereof, is demonstrated by the review which we have previously made. It has also been established by what we have heretofore said that in such taxes, almost from the beginning of our national life, have been treated as duties and not as direct taxes. Of course they concern the passing of property by death, for if there were no property to transmit there would be nothing upon which the tax levied on the occasion of death could be computed. This legislative and administrative view of such taxes has been directly upheld by this court. In Scholey v. Rew (23 Wall., 331, 349), to which we have heretofore referred, the question presented was the constitutionality of the provisions of the act of 1864, imposing a succession tax as to real estate. The assertion was that the duty was repugnant to the Constitution, because it was a direct tax and had not been apportioned. The tax was decided to be constitutional. The court said (p. 346):

"But it is clear that the tax or duty levied by the act under consideration is not a direct tax within the meaning of either of these provisions. Instead of that it is plainly an excise tax or duty, authorized by section 8 of Article I, which vests the power in Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

"Whether direct taxes, in the sense of the Constitution, comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and a tax on land is a question not absolutely decided, nor is it necessary to determine it in the present case, as it is expressly decided that the term does not include the tax on income, which can not be distinguished in principle from a succession tax such as the one involved in the present controversy."

This is decisive against the contrary contention here relied on, unless it be that the decision in Scholey v. Rew has been overruled, and therefore is no longer controlling.

The argument is that the decision in the Scholey v. Rew was overruled in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429; 158 U. S., 601). This contention is thus supported in argument.

As in the course of the opinion in Scholey v. Rew the court said that taxes on succession could not be distinguished in principle from an income tax, therefore the decision in the Pollock case, which held that an income tax was direct, it is argued, necessarily decided that an inheritance tax was also direct. But in the Pollock case the decision in Scholey v. Rew was not overruled. On the contrary, the correctness of the decision in the latter case as to the particular matter which it actually decided in effect was reaffirmed. In consequence of the statement made in Scholey v. Rew that an income tax and a succession tax could not be distinguished one from the other, that case was relied on in the Pollock case by counsel in argument and by the members of the court who dissented as establishing, for the reason stated, that the income tax was not direct. The court, however, treated Scholey v. Rew as inapplicable to an income tax, because it considered that whether an income tax was direct was not actually involved in the latter case, and hence the illustration which was used in Scholey v. Rew as to an income tax was held not to have been a decision on the question of whether or not an income tax was direct.

The court said (157 U. S., p. 577):

"Scholey v. Rew (23 Wall., p. 331) was the case of a succession tax, which the court held to be 'plainly an excise tax or duty' upon the devolution of the estate or the right to become beneficiary entitled to the same, or the income thereof, in possession or expectancy. It was like the succession tax of a State, held constitutional in Maher v. Grima (8 How., p. 490); and the distinction between the power of a State and the power of the United States to regulate the succession of property was not referred to and does not appear to have been in the mind of the court. The opinion stated that the act of Parliament, from which the particular provision under consideration was borrowed, had received substantially the same construction, and cases under that act hold that a succession duty is not a tax upon income or upon property, but on the actual benefit derived by the individual, determined as prescribed." (In re Elwes, 3 H. & N., p. 719; Attorney General v. Sefton, 2 H. & C., p. 362; S. C. (H. L.), 3 H. & C., p. 1023; 11 H. L. Cas., p. 257.)

The argument now made, therefore, comes to this: Although in the Pollock case the doctrine which the court considered as having been actually decided in Scholey v. Rew was not overruled, nevertheless, because an example which was made use of in the course of the opinion in Scholey v. Rew was disregarded, the Pollock case therefore overruled Scholey v. Rew. The issue presented in the Pollock case was whether an income tax was direct within the meaning of the Constitution. The contentions which the case involved were thus presented. On the one hand, it was argued that only capitation taxes and taxes on land as such were direct within the meaning of the Constitution, considered as a matter of first impression, and that previous adjudications had construed the Constitution as having that import. On the other hand, it was asserted that, in principle, direct taxes, in the constitutional sense, embraced not only taxes on land and capitation taxes, but all burdens laid on real or personal property because of its ownership, which were equivalent to a direct tax on such property, and it was affirmed that the previous adjudications of this court had settled nothing to the contrary. The issues which were thus presented in the Pollock case, it will be observed, had been expressly reserved in Scholey v. Rew, where it was said (23 Wall., p. 346):

"Whether direct taxes in the sense of the Constitution comprehend any other tax than a capitation tax and a tax on land is a question not absolutely decided, nor is it necessary to determine it in the present case."

The question which was thus reserved in Scholey v. Rew, and which was presented for decision in the Pollock case, was decided in the latter case, the court holding that taxes on the income of real and personal property were the legal equivalent of a direct levy on the property from which the income was derived, and therefore required apportionment. But there was no intimation in the Pollock case that inheritance taxes—which had been held in Scholey v. Rew not to be direct, which had from all time been considered as being imposed not on property, real or personal, as ordinarily understood, but as being levied on the transmission or receipt of property occasioned by death, and which had from the foundation of the Government been treated as a duty or excise—were direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution. Undoubtedly, in the course of the opinion in the Pollock case, it was said that if a tax was direct within the constitutional sense the mere erroneous qualification of it as an excise or duty would not take it out of the constitutional requirement as to apportionment. But this language related to the subject matter under consideration and was but a statement that a tax which was in itself direct, because imposed upon property solely by reason of its ownership, could not be changed by affixing to it the qualification of excise or duty. Here we are asked to decide that a tax is a direct tax on property, which has at all times been considered as the antithesis of such a tax; that is, has ever been treated as a duty or excise, because of the particular occasion which gives rise to its levy.

But it is asserted that it was decided in the income-tax cases that, in order to determine whether a tax be direct within the meaning of the Constitution, it must be ascertained whether the one upon whom by law the burden of paying it is first cast can therefore shift it to another person. If he can not, the tax would then be direct in the constitutional sense, and hence, however obvious in other respects it might be a duty, impost, or excise, it can not be levied by the rule of uniformity and must be apportioned. From this assumed premise it is argued that death duties can not be shifted from the one on whom they first cast by law, and therefore they are direct taxes requiring apportionment.

The fallacy is in the premise. It is true that in the income-tax cases the theory of certain economists by which direct and indirect taxes are classified with reference to the ability to shift the same was adverted to. But this disputable theory was not the basis of the conclusion of the court. The constitutional meaning of the word "direct" was the matter decided. Considering that the constitutional rule of apportionment had its origin in the purpose to prevent taxes on persons solely because of their general ownership of property from being levied by any other rule than that of apportionment, two things were decided by the court: First, that no sound distinction existed between a tax levied on a person solely because of his general ownership of real property, and the same tax imposed solely because of his general ownership of personal property. Secondly, that the tax on the income derived from such property, real or personal, was the legal equivalent of a direct tax on the property from which said income was derived, and hence must be apportioned. These conclusions, however, lend no support to the contention that it was decided that duties, imposts, and excises, which are not the essential equivalent of a tax on property generally, real or personal, solely because of its ownership, must be converted into direct taxes, because it is conceived that it would be demonstrated by a close analysis that they could not be shifted from the person upon whom they first fall. The proposition now relied upon was considered and refuted in Nicol v. Ames (173 U. S., 509, 515), where the court said:

"The commands of the Constitution in this, as in all other respects, must be obeyed; direct taxes must be apportioned, while indirect taxes must be uniform throughout the United States. But while yielding implicit obedience to these constitutional requirements it is no part of the duty of this court to lessen, impede, or obstruct the exercise of the taxing power by merely abstruse and subtle distinctions as to the particular nature of a specified tax, where such distinction rests more upon the different theories of political economists than upon the practical nature of the tax itself.

"In deciding upon the validity of a tax with reference to these requirements, no microscopic examination as to the purely economic or theoretical nature of the tax should be indulged in for the purpose of placing it in a category which would invalidate the tax. As a mere abstract, scientific, or economical problem, a particular tax might possibly be regarded as a direct tax, when a practical matter pertaining to the actual operation of the tax it might quite plainly appear to be indirect. Under such circumstances and while varying and disputable theories might be indulged as to the real nature of a tax, a court would not be justified, for the purpose of invalidating the tax, in placing it in a class different from that to which its practical results would consign it. Taxation is eminently practical, and is, in fact, brought to every man's door, and for the purpose of deciding upon its validity a tax should be regarded in its actual, practical results, rather than with reference to those theoretical or abstract ideas whose correctness is the subject of dispute and contradiction among those who are experts in the science of political economy."

As further revealing the power of Congress under section 8 of Article I to levy and collect taxes, I shall make reference to the case of Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain (192 U. S., 397). Under the twenty-seventh section of the act of June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for war expenditures, and for other purposes," a tax was imposed on the gross annual receipts in excess of $250,000 of every person, firm, corporation, or company carrying on or doing the business of refining sugar. The Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. paid the taxes to the collector in Pennsylvania under protest and brought an action to recover the sum so paid. The validity of the statute was challenged on the ground that it was a direct tax and under the Constitution subject to the rule of apportionment. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court, and in doing so said:

The contention of the Government is that the tax is not a direct tax, but only an excise imposed by Congress under its power to lay and collect excises which shall be uniform throughout the United States. (Art. I, sec. 8.) Clearly the tax is not imposed upon gross annual receipts as property, but only in respect of the carrying on or doing the business of refining sugar. It can not be otherwise regarded, because of the fact that the amount of the tax is measured by the amount of the gross annual receipts. The tax is defined in the act as "a special excise tax," and therefore it must be assumed, for it is worth, that Congress has no purpose to exceed its powers under the Constitution, but only to exercise the authority granted to it of laying and collecting excises.

This general question has been considered in so many cases heretofore decided that we do not deem it necessary to consider it anew upon principle. It was held in Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule (7 Wall., 433) that the income tax imposed by the internal-revenue act of June 30, 1864, amended July 13, 1866 (13 Stat., 223; 14 Stat., 98), on the amounts insured, renewed, and continued by insurance companies, on the gross amounts of premiums received, on dividends, undistributed sums, and income, was not a direct tax, but an excise duty or tax within the meaning of the Constitution; in Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall., 553) that the statute then before the court which required national banking associations, State banks, or State banking associations to pay a tax of 10 per cent on the amount of State bank notes paid out by them after a named date, did not in the sense of the Constitution impose a direct tax, but was to be classed under the head of duties, which were to be sustained upon the principles announced in the case of Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule, above cited; in Scholey v. Rew (23 Wall., 331) that the tax imposed on every devolution of title to real estate was not a direct tax, but an impost or excise, and was therefore constitutional; in Nicol v. Ames (173 U. S., 509) that the tax imposed (30 Stat., 448) upon each sale or agreement to sell any products or merchandise at an exchange, board of trade, or other similar place, either for present or future delivery, was not in the constitutional sense a direct tax upon the business itself, but in effect "a duty or excise law upon the privilege, opportunity, or facility offered at boards of trade or exchanges for the transaction of business mentioned in the act," which was "separate and apart from the business itself"; in Knowlton v. Moore (178 U. S., 41, 81) that an inheritance or succession tax was not a direct tax on property, as ordinarily understood, but an excise levied on the transmission or receipt of property occasioned by death; and in Patton v. Brady (184 U. S., 608) that the tax imposed by the act of June 13, 1898, upon tobacco, however prepared, manufactured, and sold for consumption or sale, was not a direct tax, but an excise tax, which Congress could impose; that it was not "a tax upon property as such, but upon certain kinds of property, having reference to their origin and intended use."

In view of these and other decided cases, we can not hold that the tax imposed on the plaintiff, expressly with reference to its "carrying on or doing the business of * * * refining sugar," and which was to be measured by its gross annual receipts in excess of a named sum, is other than is described in the act of Congress, a special excise tax, and not a direct one to be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers. This conclusion is inevitable from the judgments in prior cases, in which the court has dealt with the distinctions often very difficult to be expressed in words between taxes that are direct and those which are to be regarded simply as excises. The grounds on which those judgments rested need not be restated or reexamined. It would subserve no useful purpose to do so. It must suffice now to say that they clearly negative the idea that the tax here involved is a direct one to be apportioned among the States according to numbers.

It is said that if regard be had to the decision in the income-tax cases, a different conclusion from that just stated must be reached. On the contrary, the precise question here was not intended to be decided in those cases. For, in the opinion of the rehearing of the income-tax cases, the Chief Justice said: "We have considered the act only in respect of the tax on income derived from real estate and from invested personal property, and have not commented on so much of it as bears on gains or profits from business, privileges, or employments in view of the instances in which taxation on business, privileges, or employments has assumed the guise of an excise tax and been sustained as such." (158 U. S., 601.)

In the case of Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 107) the whole corporation tax was considered, and the court said:

This tax, it is expressly stated, is to be equivalent to 1 per cent of the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during the year—this is the measure of the tax explicitly adopted by the statute. The income is not limited to such as is received from property used in business, strictly speaking, but is expressly declared to be upon the entire net income above $5,000 from all sources, excluding the amounts received as dividends on stock in other corporations, joint stock companies or associations, or insurance companies also subject to the tax. In other words, the tax is imposed upon the doing of business of the character described, and the measure of the tax is to be the income, with the deduction stated, received not only from property used in business, but from every source. This view of the measure of the tax is strengthened when we note that as to organizations under the laws of foreign countries the amount of net income over and above $5,000 includes that received from business transacted and capital invested in the United States, the Territories, Alaska, and the District of Columbia.

It is further strengthened when the subsequent sections are considered as to deductions in ascertaining net income and requiring returns from those subject to the act. Under the second paragraph the net income is to be ascertained by certain deductions from the gross amount of income received within the year "from all sources;" and the return to be made to the collector of internal revenue under the third section is required to show the gross amount of the income received during the year "from all sources." The evident purpose is to secure a return of the entire income, with certain allowances and deductions which do not suggest a restriction to income derived from property actively engaged in the business. This interpretation of the act, as resting upon the doing of business, is sustained by the reasoning in Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain (192 U. S., 397), in which a special tax measured by the gross receipts of the business of refining oil and sugar was sustained as an excise in respect to the carrying on or doing of such business.

Having thus interpreted the statute in conformity, as we believe, with the intention of Congress in passing it, we proceed to consider whether, as thus construed, the statute is constitutional.

It is contended that it is not, certainly so far as the tax is measured by the income of bonds nontaxable under Federal statutes, and of municipal and State bonds beyond the Federal power of taxation. And so of real and personal estates, because as to such estates the tax is direct, and so required to be apportioned according to population among the States. It is insisted that such must be the holding unless this court is prepared to reverse the income-tax cases decided under the act of 1894. (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S., 429; S. C., 158 U. S., 601.)

The applicable provisions of the Constitution of the United States in this connection are found in Article I, section 8, clause 1, and in Article I, section 2, clause 3, and Article I, section 9, clause 4.

It was under the latter requirement as to apportionment of direct taxes according to population that this court in the Pollock case held the statute of 1894 to be unconstitutional. Upon the rehearing of the case Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, who spoke for the court, summarizing the effect of the decision, said:

"We have considered the act only in respect of the tax on income derived from real estate and from invested personal property, and have not commented on so much of it as bears on gains or profits from business, privileges, or employments, in view of the instances in which taxation on business, privileges, or employments has assumed the guise of an excise tax and has been sustained as such." (158 U. S., 635.)

And as to excise taxes, the Chief Justice said:

"We do not mean to say that an act laying by apportionment a direct tax on real estate or personal property, or the income thereof, might not also lay excise taxes on business, privileges, employments, and vocations" (p. 637).

The Pollock case was before this court in Knowlton v. Moore. (178 U. S., 41, 80.) In that case this court sustained an excise tax upon the transmission of property by inheritance. It was contended there, as here, that the case was ruled by the Pollock case, and of that case this court, speaking by the present Chief Justice, said:

"The issue presented in the Pollock case was whether an income tax was direct within the meaning of the Constitution. The contentions which the case involved were thus presented. On the one hand, it was argued that only capitation taxes and taxes on land as such were direct, within the meaning of the Constitution, considered as a matter of first impression, and that previous adjudications had construed the Constitution as having that import. On the other hand, it was asserted that in principle direct taxes, in the constitutional sense, embraced not only taxes, but all burdens laid on real or personal property because of its ownership, which were equivalent to a direct tax on such property, and it was affirmed that the previous adjudications of this court had settled nothing to the contrary.

"Undoubtedly, in the course of the opinion in the Pollock case it was said that if a tax was direct within the constitutional sense the mere erroneous qualification of it as an excise or duty would not take it out of the constitutional requirement as to apportionment. But this language related to the subject matter under consideration, and was but a statement that a tax which was in itself direct, because imposed upon property solely by reason of its ownership, could not be changed by affixing to it the qualifications of excise or duty. Here we are asked to decide that a tax is a direct tax on property which has at all times been considered as the antithesis of such a tax; that is, has ever been treated as a duty or excise, because of the particular occasion which gives rise to its levy. * * *

"Considering that the constitutional rule of apportionment had its origin in the purpose to prevent taxes on persons solely because of their general ownership of property from being levied by any other rule than that of apportionment, two things were decided by the court: First, that no sound distinction existed between a tax levied on a person solely because of his general ownership of real property and the same tax imposed solely because of his general ownership of personal property. Secondly, that the tax on the income derived from such property, real or personal, was the legal equivalent of a direct tax on the property from which said income was derived, and hence must be apportioned. These conclusions, however, lend no support to the contention that it was decided that duties, imposts, and excises, which are not the essential equivalent of a tax on property generally, real or personal, solely because of its ownership must be converted into direct taxes, because it is conceded that it would be demonstrated by a close analysis that they could not be shifted from the person upon whom they first fell."

The same view was taken of the Pollock case in the subsequent case of Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain (192 U. S., 397).

The act now under consideration does not impose direct taxation upon property solely because of its ownership, but the tax is within the class which Congress is authorized to lay and collect under Article I, section 8, clause 1, of the Constitution, and described generally as taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, upon which the limitation is that they shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Within the category of indirect taxation, as we shall have further occasion to show, is embraced a tax upon business done in a corporate capacity, which is the subject matter of the tax imposed in the act under consideration. The Pollock case construed the tax there levied as direct, because it was imposed upon property simply because of its ownership. In the present case the tax is not payable unless there be a carrying on or doing of business in the designated capacity, and this is made the occasion for the tax, measured by the standard prescribed. The difference between the acts is not merely nominal, but rests upon substantial differences between the mere ownership of property and the actual doing of business in a certain way.

It is unnecessary to enter upon an extended consideration of the technical meaning of the term "excise." It has been the subject matter of considerable discussion—the terms duties, imposts, and excises are generally treated as embracing the indirect forms of taxation contemplated by the Constitution. As Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said in the Pollock case (157 U. S., 557):

"Although there have been from time to time intimations that there might be some tax which was not a direct tax nor included under the words 'duties, imposts, and excises,' such a tax for more than 100 years of national existence has as yet remained undiscovered, notwithstanding the stress of particular circumstances has invited thorough investigation into sources of revenue."

And in the same connection the late Chief Justice delivering the opinion of the court in Thomas v. United States (192 U. S., 363), in speaking of the words "duties, imposts, and excises," said:

"We think that they were used comprehensively to cover customs and excise duties imposed on importation, consumption, manufacture, and sale of certain commodities, privileges, particular business transactions, vocations, occupations, and the like."

Duties and imposts are terms commonly applied to levies laid by governments on the importations or exportations of commodities. Excises are "taxes laid upon the manufacture, sale, or consumption of commodities within the country, upon licenses to pursue certain occupations, and upon corporate privileges." (Cooley, Const. Lim., 7th ed., 680.)

The tax under consideration, as we have construed the statute, may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity, i. e., with the advantages which arises from corporate or quasi corporate organization, or when applied to insurance companies for doing the business of such companies. As was said in the Thomas case (192 U. S., 363, supra), the requirement to pay such taxes involved the exercise of privileges, and the element of absolute and unavoidable demand is lacking. Its business is not done in the manner described in the statute; no tax is payable.

If we are correct in holding that this is an excise tax, there is nothing in the Constitution requiring such tax to be apportioned according to population. (Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall., 433; Springer v. United States, 102 U. S., 586; Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain, 192 U. S., 397.)

From time to time attention has been called by judges and lawyers to the point that section 8 of Article I provided that Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to provide for the common defense and the general welfare; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, particular attention being called to the fact that the limitation as to uniformity does not include the word "taxes." It has been intimated in some of the opinions that this left a third kind of tax which was not specifically limited to apportionment or uniformity. On the other hand, it has been argued—notably by Mr. Choate in the Pollock case—that the omission of the word "tax" as to uniformity indicated that there was only one kind of tax, and that was the direct tax referred to in section 9, which tax would have to be levied by apportionment. It appears from an examination of the debates that neither one of these contentions is supportable. On Saturday, August 25, Mr. McHenry and Gen. Pinckney made the following propositions:

Should it be judged expedient by the Legislature of the United States that one or more ports for collecting duties and imposts, other than those ports of entrance and clearance already established by the respective States, should be established, the Legislature of the United States shall signify the same to the executives of the respective States, ascertaining the number of such ports judged necessary, to be laid by the said executives before the legislatures of the States at their next session; and the Legislature of the United States shall not have the power of fixing or establishing the particular ports for collecting duties or imposts in any State, except the legislature of such State shall neglect to fix and establish the same during their first session to be held after such notification by the Legislature of the United States to the executive of such State.

All duties, imposts, and excises, prohibitions or restraints made or laid by the Legislature of the United States shall be uniform and equal throughout the United States.

These several propositions were referred to a committee composed of a member from each State. From this it would appear that the matter under consideration was not dealt with in connection with the power of Congress to levy taxes, but had reference more particularly to the preference between the States. On August 28 Mr. Sherman, from the committee to whom these propositions were referred, made the following report, which was ordered to lie on the table:

That there be inserted after the fourth clause of the seventh section, "Nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another, or oblige vessels bound to or from any State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another, and all tonnage, duties, imposts, and excises laid by the legislature shall be uniform throughout the United States."

On August 31 the report of the grand committee of 11, made by Mr. Sherman, was taken up. On the question to agree to the following clause to be inserted after Article VII, section 4:

Nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another.

This was agreed to nem. con.

On the clause, "Or oblige vessels bound to or from any State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another," Mr. Madison thought the restriction would be inconvenient as in the River Delaware a vessel can not be required to make entry below the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. Mr. Fitzsimons admitted that it might be inconvenient, but thought it would be a greater inconvenience to require vessels bound to Philadelphia to enter below the jurisdiction of the State. Mr. Gorham and Mr. Langdon contended that the Government would be so fettered by this clause as to defeat the good purpose of the plan. They mentioned the situation of the trade of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, the case of Sandy Hook, which is in the State of New Jersey, but where precautions against smuggling into New York ought to be established by the General Government. Mr. McHenry said the clause would not screen a vessel from being obliged to take an officer on board as a security for due entry. Mr. Carroll was anxious that the clause should be agreed to. He assured the House that it was a tender point in Maryland. Mr. Jenifer urged the necessity of the clause in the same point of view. On the question of agreeing to it, the vote was 8 to 2 in favor it. The word "tonnage" was struck out as comprehended in "duties." On the question on the clause of the report "and all duties, imposts, and excises laid by the legislature shall be uniform throughout the United States," was agreed to nem. con.

On Tuesday, September 4, Mr. Brearly, from the committee of 11, made a partial report, as follows:

1. The first clause of article 7, section 1, to read as follows: "The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States."

On Friday, September 14, the record of debate shows, as follows:

Article I, section 8. The words "but all such duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" were unanimously annexed to the power of taxation.

And thus there seems to have been merged in this one section the grant of the power to tax and the limitation, which limitation grew out of an entirely different purpose on the part of the framers of the Constitution than is commonly credited to them demonstrating to a certainty that the language "but all such duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" was purposely meant to exclude taxes. The language of the record, "were unanimously annexed to the power of taxation," I think, completely demolishes the contention made by Mr. Choate, and altogether answers the suggestion made in some of the opinions that there is a third kind of taxation not defined.

We come now to a definite consideration of the particular bill pending, the object of which is to make subject to taxation all individuals, partnerships, and firms with respect to their doing business. It must be understood at the outset that no tax is levied on the income or the amount of the income. This bill simply taxes the doing of business, and then, in a homely sort of way, says that the amount of the tax shall be equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during each year. We need not disguise the proposition that it is formulated on the same basis as the corporation tax, section 38 of an act of Congress approved August 5, 1909, which reads:

SEC. 38. That every corporation, joint-stock company, or association, organized for profit and having a capital stock represented by shares, and every insurance company, now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory of the United States or under the acts of Congress applicable to Alaska or the District of Columbia, or now or hereafter organized under the laws of any foreign country and engaged in business in any State or Territory of the United States or in Alaska or in the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint-stock company, or association, or insurance company, equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it from all sources during such year, exclusive of amounts received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies subject to the tax hereby imposed; or if organized under the laws of any foreign country, upon the amount of net income over and above $5,000 received by it from business transacted and capital invested within the United States and its Territories, Alaska, and the District of Columbia during such year, exclusive of amounts so received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies subject to the tax hereby imposed.

The corporation tax did not attempt to say what was the doing of business by a corporation, because we all understand that a corporation, with a few unimportant exceptions, is not organized except for the purpose of doing business. In its application for a charter, wherever it is made, and in its grant it is always described as being incorporated for the doing of some certain business, and therefore evidence of the fact that it is doing business is incontestibly established by its corporate charter. We are all quite well aware of the fact that corporations, to a large extent, took the place of partnerships and firms. Indeed, we have only to recur to the fact that when the Constitution was adopted there were only four corporations in the United States, whereas now there are two hundred and seventy-odd thousand; so that the defense of the corporation tax was rather a defense of the exception than of the general rule.

This tax, it is expressly stated, is to be with respect to the carrying on or doing business by certain corporations and associations, and is to be equivalent to 1 per cent of the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by all persons during such year. This is the measure of the tax explicitly adopted by the law. The income is not limited to receipts from property as such, strictly speaking, but it is expressly declared that the tax shall be upon the entire net income above $5,000 from all sources, excluding the amount received from any firm or co-partnership if the special excise tax of 1 per cent imposed by this act has been paid by any corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company from which the income is received.

Under this act there arose the case of Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 107), in which, in a number of appeals, almost every phase of the law and its interpretation was presented. The case was elaborately briefed and argued by very eminent counsel for the Government and for the appellants. It is notable that in the brief of Mr. William D. Guthrie and Mr. Victor Morawitz, who were representing the appellee in No. 410, they had this to say, which is particularly pertinent to the validity of the pending bill:

A tax upon income derived from the carrying on or doing business is an excise and not a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution.

Commenting further, Mr. Guthrie, who had had an intimate and close association with the Pollock case, made this significant statement, on the question of the constitutionality of the pending bill:

The constitutional provisions conferring upon Congress the power to impose taxes make no distinction between corporations and individuals. Indeed, corporations are not mentioned in the Constitution.

The distinguishing feature of the corporation-tax law as an exercise of the power to levy an excise upon the doing of business is this: In nearly all of the cases prior to that time, particularly in the Spreckels case, the gross receipts were necessarily the result of the carrying on of the business the doing of which was taxed, while in the corporation-tax act for the first time this language was employed. Leaving out unnecessary parts, the act says:

Every corporation, joint-stock company, or association organized for profit shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing of business by such corporation, joint-stock company, or association or insurance company equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it from all sources during such year.

It was earnestly contended by the very able counsel in the case that the only way in which the constitutionality of the law could be sustained was to limit that portion of it to such income as was derived from the actual carrying on of the business taxed. That was one of the very sharp contentions in the case. Mr. Justice Day, who delivered the opinion of the court, disposes of that contention as follows:

This tax, it is expressly stated, is to be equivalent to 1 per cent of the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during the year. This is the measure of the tax explicitly adopted by the statute. The income is not limited to such as is received from property used in the business, strictly speaking, but is expressly declared to be upon the entire net income above $5,000 from all sources, excluding the amounts received as dividends on stock in other corporations, joint-stock companies, or associations or insurance companies, also subject to the tax. In other words, the tax is imposed upon the doing of business of the character described, and the measure of the tax is to be the income, with the deductions stated, received not only from the property used from business but from every source. This view of the measure of the tax is strengthened when we note that as to organizations under the laws of foreign countries the amount of the net income over and above $5,000 includes that received from business transacted and capital invested in the United States, the Territories, Alaska, and the District of Columbia.

It has been contended since the decision in this case of Flint v. Stone-Tracy Co. that the validity of the act was vindicated on the ground that it was a tax upon the doing of business through a corporate charter, and that therefore an act levying a similar tax on individuals can not be sustained. The error, however, in this construction of the Flint case is, I think, just here: In the case of a corporation it is almost a conclusive presumption that they are carrying on business because they would close up if they did not. They make their application, setting forth the fact that they wish to carry on business, receive a charter which empowers them to do this, and on the very face of the thing the proof is conclusive that they are doing business. The real meaning of the Flint case as to any distinctions between corporations and individuals was that Congress had a right to select a class such as corporate businesses and tax the doing of business and measure the tax by the net income from whatever source derived.

Now, coming to the provision of the pending bill, it is only necessary to say that it is in the precise terms and language of the corporation-tax act. Practically the only question raised on the face of the bill is the one as to what will be held to be "carrying on business," and the author of the bill in defining the word "business" adopted the definition which the Supreme Court in the case of Flint v. Stone-Tracy Co. used. Mr. Justice Day, writing for the court, said:

It remains to consider whether these corporations are engaged in business. "Business" is a very comprehensive term and embraces everything about which a person can be employed. (Black's Law Dictionary, 158, citing People v. Commissioner of Taxes, 23 N. Y., 242, 244.) "That which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of a livelihood or profit." (Bouvier's Law Dictionary, Vol. I, p. 273.)

We think it is clear that corporations organized for the purpose of doing business and actually engaged in such activities as leasing property, collecting rents, managing office buildings, making investments of profits, or leasing ore lands and collecting royalties, managing wharves, dividing profits, and in some cases investing the surplus are engaged in business within the meaning of this statute and in the capacity necessary to make such organizations subject to the law.

The word "business" is not an obscure one and not without meaning in the law. It has been the subject of adjudication and legislation for hundreds of years. Going for a moment to the English authorities, we find that in 15 Chancery Division Mr. Justice Jessel, master of rolls, gave an opinion in the case of Smith v. Anderson which rather learnedly discusses the meaning of the word "business":

As regards the only point which is not elaborately discussed in Sykes v. Beadon, the meaning of the word "business," I must say in a few words. In Sykes v. Beadon the only point I had to consider was whether it was an association formed for the purpose of gain. The supposed distinction between an association formed for the purpose of gain and an association formed for the purpose of taking upon itself a business having for its object the purpose of gain was not there argued, but it has been argued since, and I have given an opinion on it which I will repeat. First, what is the meaning of "any other business"? Now, "business" itself is a word of large and indefinite import. I have before me the last edition of Johnson's Dictionary, edited by Dr. Latham, and there the first meaning given of it is "employment, transaction of affairs"; the second, "an affair"; the third, "subject of business, affair, or object which engages the care." Then there are some other meanings, and the sixth is "something to be transacted." The seventh is "something required to be done." Then taking the last edition of the Imperial Dictionary, which is a very good dictionary, we find it a little more definite, but with a remark which is worth reading: "Business, employment, that which occupies the time and attention and labor of men for the purpose of profit or improvement." That is to say, anything which occupies the time and attention and labor of a man for the purpose of profit is business. It is a word of extensive use and indefinite signification. Then, "business is a particular occupation, as agriculture, trade, mechanics, art, or profession, and when used in connection with particular employments it admits of the plural—that is, businesses." Therefore the legislature could not well have used a larger word.

In addition to the two dictionaries, I have also looked at the case of Harris v. Amery, (1) in which 46 people hired some land to carry on a farm; that is, they carried on the farm between them. A single man carrying on a farm may farm his own land, but he is carrying on a business. Sometimes he is called a gentleman farmer, but he is still carrying on a business and, of course, these 46 persons were carrying on a business, and it was held that it was an illegal association under this very act of Parliament, because there were more than 20 of them. The passage I am about to read is from the judgment of that very eminent and lamented judge, Mr. Justice Willes (2): "It should seem, by 25 and 26 Vict., c. 89, s. 4, that the legislature, viewing the frauds which have been committed by large companies, and the great inconvenience which was found to arise by reason of the difficulty of enforcing claims and settling accounts between surviving members and executors of deceased members, and otherwise, have thought fit to determine that no company, association, or partnership consisting of more than 20 persons shall be formed for the purpose of carrying on any business that has for its object the acquisition of gain by the company or its members, unless registered under the act. And I think it has done that by language which does not admit of any reasonable doubt. It is unnecessary to refer to authorities to show that 'business' has a more extensive signification than 'trade.' The earlier bankrupt acts did not embrace farms; but it was never doubted that farming was a 'business,' though not a 'trade.' Banking is not strictly a trade. Where land comes to a number of persons by operation of law they can not be said to be partners, and they may, consistently with the act, farm it. But when we find an association like this, which is rendered illegal by an act of Parliament, we can not take notice of the agreement under which they become tenants, for the purpose of establishing a right in a court of law, or hold that the occupation by one of their body is an occupation by all the members of the illegal association."

Now, knowing what "business" means, is there any distinction between a person carrying on any other business which has for its object the acquisition of gain and the words "formed for the purpose of the acquisition of gain"? It must be a business to acquire a gain, and really the words add nothing to it. "Formed for the purpose of gain," as I put it in Sykes v. Beadon (1), is the same thing. You can not acquire gain by means of a company except by carrying on some business or other, and I have no doubt if anyone formed a company or association for the purpose of acquiring gain he must form it for the purpose of carrying on a business by which gain is to be obtained. But whether that be so or not, I am clearly of opinion that where investment is made a business, or where the dealing in securities is made a business, it is a business within the purview of this act. There are many things which in common colloquial English would not be called a business, even when carried on by a single person, which would be so called when carried on by a number of persons. That is a distinction not to be forgotten, even if we were trying the question by the ordinary use of the English language. For instance, a man who is the owner of offices, that is, of a house divided into several floors and used for commercial purposes, would not be said to carry on a business because he let the offices as such; but suppose a company was formed for the purpose of buying a building, or leasing a house, to be divided into offices, and to be let out, should not we say, if that was the object of the company, that the company was carrying on business for the purpose of letting offices, or was an office-letting company, trying it by the use of ordinary colloquial language? The same observation may be made as regards a single individual buying or selling land, with this addition, that he may make it a business, and then it is a question of continuity. A man occasionally buys and sells land, as many landowners do, and nobody would say he was a land jobber or dealer in land, but if a man made it his particular business to buy and sell land to obtain profit, he would be designated as a land jobber or dealer in land.

When you come to an association or company formed for a purchase you say at once that it is a business, because there you have that from which you would infer continuity; it is formed to do that and nothing else, and, therefore, at once you would say that the company carried on a business. So, in the ordinary case of investments, a man who has money to invest invests his money, and he may occasionally sell the investments and buy others, but he is not carrying on a business. But when you have an association formed or where an individual makes it his continuous occupation—the business of his life to buy and sell securities—he is called a stock jobber or share jobber, and nobody doubts for a moment that he is carrying on business. So, if a company is formed for doing the very same thing—that is, for investing money belonging to persons in the purchase of stocks and shares and changing them from time to time, either with limited or unlimited powers—I should say there can be no question that they are carrying on a business, whether you call it a business of investment or a business of dealing in securities, or, as in the case before me, both the business of investment and the business of dealing in securities.

In Ninth Blatchford, in the case of In re Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Co. (p. 397), the court had occasion to consider the meaning of the term "carrying on business," and Justice Woodruff has this to say:

In its broadest sense the term "business" includes nearly all the affairs in which either an individual or a corporation can be actors. Indulgence in pleasure, participation in domestic enjoyment, and engagement in the offices of merely personal religion may be exceptions in the case of an individual. But the employment of means to secure or provide for these would, to him, be a business; and, to a corporation, these exceptions can have no application. The conduct of any and all of the affairs of a corporation is business. Does, then, the doing of any acts whatever pertaining to the affairs of a railroad corporation constitute "carrying on business," in the sense of the act? Has the term "carrying on business" the same meaning as "transacting any of its business"? If the necessities or interests of a railroad company require that an agent should be sent to a timber region to purchase or otherwise procure—e. g., by cutting, sawing, etc.—materials for its superstructure, is that carrying on business there? If it send an agent or agents to a city, the center of capital, to negotiate its bonds and raise money in aid of the construction of its road, and such agency be continued for that purpose and for receiving subsequent remittances and making payment of interest or other indebtedness at an office provided therefor, is that carrying on business in such city, within the meaning of the act? I am constrained, not only by considerations already suggested, but by what, upon the words themselves, should be deemed their proper interpretation, to answer these questions in the negative. There are in the carrying on of a business many affairs which are merely incidental and which may be, and often are, transacted elsewhere than at the place where the business—that which is the real design and purpose or object in view—is located, and such transactions may be of such frequent or even daily occurrence as to require an agency of considerable duration. It would seem to me greatly unjust and unreasonable to regard such transactions as carrying on a business in the sense of the law. "Carrying on business" looks to the scheme and purpose to which such transactions tend and not to the incidental transactions themselves. Thus the business of a railroad corporation is, by its charter, the construction, maintenance, and operation of a railroad. That is its business. In aid thereof it may be necessary or expedient to employ agents and agencies—since it can only act by agents—in other places than those in which its business of constructing, maintaining, and operating the road can be done. But the transactions of such agents are only collateral or incidental. They do not, in a just sense, constitute the business of the railroad company. That business can not be removed. The company itself can not transfer it. Agents, or officers who are agents, and only agents, may from a distance advise therein, give rules or directions to other agents for its management, but the business of the railroad company can only be done where the railroad company is, or is to be, constructed, maintained, and operated.

I do not undertake to determine, nor would I, to what extent the courts would construe the language of this bill or to say what activities would be sufficient to bring the conduct of an individual within the term "carrying on business." I could not give you a concrete illustration and say thus and so will be the standard, any more than I could if we had a bill pending which provided that no person should make fraudulent disposition of his property and you should give me a case and ask me whether or not that would come within the meaning of "fraudulent disposition of property." We are not employing new words. This word is as old as jurisprudence itself and has been used to measure the activities of each generation according to the exigencies and developments of that generation. I am not prepared to deny or affirm that Andrew Carnegie, standing, with his face all aglow, in front of his blast furnaces—the stocky little Scotchman, tense with uncontrollable ambition and energy—would be any different in the eyes of the law than Andrew Carnegie, his face white with the student's pallor, looking at the parchment which represents his four hundred millions of bonds. [Applause.] In other words, I am not prepared to say what this generation will fix as the standard of doing business. His bonds stand for the stupendous value of what is his property. He has a potential interest and a partial control over the destiny of a great and gigantic enterprise. Under the terms of the mortgage, I have no doubt, the bondholders, under certain exigencies, might meet and to a large extent extend or withdraw the power and influence of the company. In nearly all instances, the sale of shares of stock to a considerable extent went with the bonds. That share ownership, reaching from the sovereignty of the shareholder into the complicated machinery of the company, enables them to press the mainsprings of action and make the wheels go round. Will we say that this is doing business? Will we refuse to say that it is doing business because it is done with more ease and facility, and leaves more time for leisure, and represents economy in time and work? In the notable case of Hardware Co. v. Manufacturing Co. (86 Tex., 143), Mr. Justice Stayton had occasion to consider the meaning of the word "business," and said:

"Business" is defined to be "that which busies, or that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of one as his principal concern, whether for a longer or for a shorter time; employment; occupation."—Webster. "Business" is a word of large signification, and denotes the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living. (Goddard v. Chaffee, 2 Allen, 395.)

It is the synonym of employment, signifying that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of a livelihood or profit. (Martin v. The State, 59 Ala., 36.)

The corporation making the conveyance in question was a private trading corporation the business of which consisted in buying and selling for profit in the ordinary course of mercantile business. That was its business within the meaning of the statute, and when that ceased, without intent to resume, the business no longer existed, and no contract thereafter made could be essential to the transaction of—the doing of—that business.

The mere act of paying or securing an indebtedness can never become a business.

In the case of Brauetigam v. Edwards (38 N. J., Eq.) the court had occasion to consider the meaning of the term business, and in doing so spoke as follows:

Besides, business does not mean stock, or machinery, or capital and the like. While business can not be done without these, in commercial language it is as distinct from them as labor is from capital. In speaking of the business that may be done by a merchant, banker, or railroad company, the mind does not contemplate or dwell upon the character or quality of the means used, but of the operations, whether great or small, complex or simple, numerous or few, for one or the other of these conditions may arise from much or little stock or capital. In other words, "business" does not mean dry goods, nor cash, nor iron rails and coaches. Business is not these lifeless and dead things, but the activities in which they are employed. When in motion, then the owners are said to be in business, and then it is that merchants and others speak of the profits of the business.

In People v. The Commissioner of Taxes (123 N. Y., 244) the court considered briefly the meaning of the word "business," and used the following language:

The word "business" embraces everything about which a person can be employed, and the sum is "invested" whenever its amount is represented by anything but money. No conclusion can be arrived at in this case by following out the precise lexicographical meaning of these terms. The statute is to be interpreted, therefore, by the light to be obtained from its general scope and tenor, from other statutes in pari materia, and from a consideration of the evils and abuses at which it was aimed.

Reference has been made to the case of Zonne v. Minneapolis Syndicate (220 U. S.) as an authoritative definition of what would be considered by the court as the doing of business. In that case a statement of the facts will clear the question of any doubt. Mr. Justice Day said:

The case presents a peculiarity of corporate organization and purpose not involved in the case just decided. The Minneapolis Syndicate, as the allegations of the bill admitted by the demurrer show, was originally organized for and engaged in the business of letting stores and offices in a building owned by it, and collecting and receiving rents therefor. On the 27th of December, 1906, the corporation demised and let all of the tracts, lots, and parcels of land belonging to it, being the westerly half of block 87 in the city of Minneapolis, to Richard M. Bradley, Arthur Lyman, and Russell Tyson as trustees for the term of 130 years from January 1, 1907, at an annual rental of $61,000, to be paid by said lessees to said corporation. At that time the corporation caused its articles of incorporation, which had heretofore been those of a corporation organized for profit, to be so amended as to read:

"The sole purpose of the corporation shall be to hold the title to the westerly one-half of block 87 of the town of Minneapolis, now vested in the corporation, subject to a lease thereof for a term of 130 years from January 1, 1907, and for the convenience of its stockholders to receive and to distribute among them from time to time the rentals that accrue under said lease and the proceeds of any disposition of said land."

As we have construed the corporation tax law (Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., ante, p. 107) it provides for an excise upon the carrying on or doing of business in a corporate capacity. We have held in the preceding cases that corporations organized for profit under the laws of the State, authorized to manage and rent real estate, and being so engaged, are doing business within the meaning of the law, and are therefore liable to the tax imposed.

The corporation involved in the present case, as originally organized and owning and renting an office building, was doing business within the meaning of the statute as we have construed it. Upon the record now presented we are of opinion that the Minneapolis Syndicate, after the demise of the property and reorganization of the corporation, was not engaged in doing business within the meaning of the act. It had wholly parted with control and management of the property; its sole authority was to hold the title subject to the lease for 130 years, to receive and distribute the rentals which might accrue under the terms of the lease, or the proceeds of any sale of the land if it should be sold. The corporation had practically gone out of business in connection with the property, and had disqualified itself by the terms of reorganization from any activity in respect to it. We are of opinion that the corporation was not doing business in such wise as to make it subject to the tax imposed by the act of 1909.

This revenue-raising power was vested in Congress by the Constitution, and three-fourths of its vitality has been subtracted from it in the Pollock case, and upon this ground, if upon no other, we would have the right, if we chose to do so, to pass a plain, direct income tax, and appeal to the court to reconsider the opinion which reversed the traditions of a hundred years, and ask them to restore to us, as the revenue-raising branch of this Government, the power which was intended to be written there in aid of the crumbling ruins of the old Confederation, which had failed on account of it. [Applause.]

And let me suggest in that connection one other consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. I will not object to that if the time be charged to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman desire?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Take plenty of time. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLETON. I think if you will give me 20 or 30 minutes, I can conclude.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLETON. I was about to say that there is one other consideration in connection with that clause of the Constitution. Generally speaking, the Federal Government is without police power. I believe the question came up the other day that all of the police power of the Government, so far as it affected interstate commerce, was conferred upon the Government by the section giving it exclusive control of interstate commerce. We know what the general exercise of the police power of the States is. We know how frequently it is invoked, how necessary it is to the life and welfare and the betterment of the State. We know that it is always invoked for the general welfare of the State. Now, this clause of the Constitution, however it was carved out, or by whatever processes or vicissitudes of debate, the fact remains that it says that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts. For what purpose? In order to pay the debts. And for what other purpose? To provide for the common defense and the general welfare.

In other words, in terms, in this particular section of the Constitution, as in no other section, the police power is written in the face of section 8 of Article I.

So that the purposes which Congress may tax for are the same purposes which a State may tax for to promote its general welfare and provide for its general health and security.

I have thus discussed these particular decisions of the court, this particular history, and the varying influences they may have on your mind as to the true meaning of section 8, Article I. I shall, if I can, make myself clear. I believe that Congress has the right to tax the incomes of this country if it can do so through the apportionment branch of the Constitution, or if it can do so through the excise branch of the Constitution. I believe the time will come when on this floor men will rise and say that the test of a direct tax is a tax which may be apportioned, and that no other tax can be a direct tax. Because, if the power to tax which is vested in this Government by that provision of the Constitution is to remain a vital thing, the doctrine of apportionment, except as to capitation and land, is bound to be a foredoomed failure.

So that the Constitution, intending to give us the power, and only providing two ways in which the power should be exercised, we must not get it into our heads that incomes are exempt from taxation. I know friends of mine and associates time and again have repeated to me, "Yes; but you can not tax incomes," never thinking that they might be in the transmutations of wealth and the development of history the great source of taxation, and that the Constitution never meant to inhibit the taxation of income, but only provided that if you levied direct taxes you must go by apportionment, and if you taxed by excise, imposts, or duties, you must go by uniformity. That being so, this bill in question provides for the taxation of the doing of business, with reference to the carrying on of business, taxing the doing of business, and measuring the tax by the equivalent of 1 per cent above an income of $5,000.

It has been said to me on the floor and elsewhere that this is simply another way of trying to reach the income. I say, so far as I am concerned and upon my own responsibility, that as far as I can make it a way constitutionally to reach the income I shall support it all the more heartily. [Applause.] I would not mask the thing, I would not share in an effort to do indirectly what the Constitution has forbidden to do directly. If there were such a law, that incomes for some reason had been sanctified beyond the power of taxation, I would not undertake to do in this manner what ought not to be done in any other manner. This is as subject to the power of this Government to tax as any other character or class of property. The only thing that has happened is that the power of the Government to tax unchallenged for 100 years was suddenly struck down by the decision of the court, and by that means these great resources of wealth were made exempt from the taxing power of the Government, and I say—either through the excise arm of the Government, by levying upon the doing of business and measuring it according to the income, or by the plain reversal of the Pollock case—there must come back into the power of the Government the full authority, the full strength, and the full vitality of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Let us consider for a moment what has happened in the change of business in this country. In 1798 there were a little more than 3,000,000 people, and, according to the report of Mr. Franklin, nine-tenths of the people were engaged in agriculture. There were four corporations in existence when the Constitution was adopted. To-day we have 270,202 corporations whose income is in excess of $5,000 annually. These have an aggregate capital stock of $57,886,430,519.04, a bonded and other indebtedness of $30,717,336,008.84, and an aggregate net income of $3,360,250,642.65. Allowing for inflated capitalization, which we all know exists, let us consider the character of this colossal wealth.

It is corporate; it is distributed in shares, and as such it is the surest guaranty of the inviolability of the right of private property. Look at it from an even broader standpoint and consider it in connection with the nations of the earth. It means the ownership of American values in other countries, and it means the ownership by Americans of the values of other countries. Our bonds and stocks are in English, French, and German markets and are owned by the citizens and subjects of those countries. The bonds and stocks of other countries are in our markets and are owned by our citizens. All of this is distinctly collective ownership. It tends strongly and inevitably to unite in an inseparable industrial alliance and to bring into common interest the welfare of the nations made interdependent by this class of owership. I had almost said that it was upon this silent and resistless knitting together of the interests of the human race we can rely more than upon arbitration for the peace of the world.

What are the other kinds of wealth in our country? How do we judge of this wealth? How do we estimate the thrift and enterprise of the people of our country? Over against this corporate wealth, over against this collective and colossal empire of property, let us set off that distinctly individualistic ownership, that naked individualism for which agriculture stands. The estimated value of farm products for the year 1911 is $8,417,000,000. This is the gross value of farm products, without subtracting the cost of production. No estimate has been made of the cost of this production, but I dare say, if we subtracted from the gross figure $8,417,000,000, it would bring the net value of farm products not very far from the figure $3,360,250,642.65, which was the net income of corporate or collective property. The estimated value of the corn crop is $1,700,000,000 for the year 1911. The estimated value of the cotton crop is $775,000,000. The estimated value of the hay crop is $700,000,000. The estimated value of the wheat crop is $600,000,000. The estimated value of the oats crop is $380,000,000. The estimated value of the potato crop is $213,000,000; and yet only two of these—corn and cotton—exceed the net income of all the corporations in one State, the State of New York, which was $689,000,000, in round numbers.

The corn crop, which as a wealth producer is practically equal to the combined values of the cotton, wheat, and oats crop, is $1,700,000,000, and yet the net income of the corporations of Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York together equal $1,672,000,000, or practically these four States yield in the net income of their corporations as much as the great wealth-producing crop of the Nation.

Thus we have, on the one hand, the great collective ownership of property represented by these 270,000 corporate agencies, and, on the other hand, the distinctly individualistic ownership of the farm represented by this gross income of $8,417,000,000.

What has taken place in the miracle of a hundred years? What energies have burst out from that little fringe on the Atlantic and spread countless contrivances and multiplied benefits of civilization toward the Pacific slope? What transmutations have taken place in industrialism, where collectivism, through this vast corporate development with its myriad agencies, have taken the place of the old individualism? What changes have taken place in the cities? A man in New York owns 20 by 80 feet on Broadway. He builds a 30-story building. Is he in the real-estate business? Is his income from the land? Does the revenue come from real estate? To be sure it rests upon that foundation, but he reaches up into the heavens and captures the atmosphere, boxes it up, frescoes it, and sells it day by day as merchandise, the income from which enriches him and enables him to carry all his burdens. [Applause.] Is this doing business? Is that a direct tax on land or on his income? Have we not passed away from the days of the simple, raw earth and the tilling of the fields? The old doctrine was that a direct tax was one which you could not shift, but in a nation in which every person produces a surplus of some sort every tax is shiftable except a poll tax. If we expect to tax the wealth of this country as we ought to tax it, we must revitalize to its full vigor section 8 of Article I.

We must not stand paralyzed in front of the impeding influence of the Pollock case, or fearful in front of a man who says, as a bondholder, that he is not taxable. [Loud applause.] I claim that we have a right to reach through these various arms of section 8 as to duties, imposts, and excises and tap the wealth of this country and bring it to the support of the Government. We have a right to reach out and turn this wealth into the channels which will lead to a common treasury. It was this supreme power of taxation that was lodged with us through and under section 8. It must not be allowed to atrophy under discouraging decisions. It must not be allowed to wither up by the abandonment of its power.

I remember the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], in which he said, in substance, that if 95 per cent of the people of this country were exempted under this bill, because it taxed only incomes in excess of $5,000, I would criticize it, too. If this 95 per cent of the people to whom he referred paid no other tax, I could share with him this criticism of the bill. But he does not forget, I am sure, that for all of these years the 95 per cent, whom he says will be exempted under this bill, have been paying taxes and are now paying it with the food they eat and the clothes they wear under the indirect system. [Applause.]

Mr. SHARP. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. LITTLETON. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Is it not also true that the remaining 5 per cent only own vastly more property than the 95 per cent that would be exempt under this act?

Mr. LITTLETON. I would imagine that would be very accurate. But one other thing. My own State, New York, the State of Pennsylvania, and States powerful in wealth and influence and riches and accumulation, I do not think are unjust. I believe, so far as they know and understand the application of the taxing laws, they would not be willing to impose a burden upon those less able to bear them. I have heard people say, and they have said, that this tax would be paid, if it were an income tax, by Pennsylvania, New York, and the richer States of the East. While this may be partially true, I would remind them that for a hundred years the West and South have been paying the inscrutable and unseen contribution of a tariff system which is so mixed up with our revenue raising that we are compelled to raise a disturbance before we can raise revenue. [Loud applause.] I stand for this proposition more enthusiastically than for any other. I would divorce, as soon as I could, without disturbing the structure of business in this country, the raising of revenue from the favoritism and protection of manufactures. [Applause.] My friends upon the Republican side, if I differ from you radically upon any question it is because of the fact that your protective-tariff system has encouraged you to deny the authority and power of this Government under section 8 of Article I to get revenue; because of the fact that you have pulled the Government into a complicated alliance with business; because of the fact that you took the great revenue-raising power of levying imposts necessary to procure the revenues for the Government and turned it over to the private individual, who was made the beneficiary of your system, and the Government lost the revenue and the individual proceeded to tax through the cost of his wares and goods for his own profit. [Loud applause.] I would not undertake with one blow to destroy the industrial structure of our country, for I am at all times a conservative man, whether you call me a Democrat, a reactionary Republican, or a Progressive.

On that subject let me say in passing that my conservatism goes back to the structure of this Government, and I would not let violent hands be laid upon it any more than upon the ark of the covenant; but as to all economic questions I hold my mind open for the morrow, until a new miracle of civilization shall present itself and require a different treatment.

I make one plea in conclusion. There has been an effort to array the West against the East and the East against the West. I count that man as much an enemy to the progress of his country who sets them at each other's throats as I would count the man who blindly fomented the strife between the North and the South in 1860. There should be industrial peace between the East and the West. They should mutually cooperate here and elsewhere for the equalization of the burdens of taxation to be borne by the whole country.

My friends, it may be too much to predict, and yet I feel that the time will come when we shall rescue this Government from its complicated alliance with business on the one hand and from its complicated alliance with labor on the other; from its alliance with individuals of one class and another, and that we may be able to restore it to that rarer, higher, and purer atmosphere where it will stand with its feet firmly resting upon the Constitution and with its arms extended, protecting the life, the liberty, and the happiness of all the people of the Nation. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BURLESON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4623. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 2243. An act to correct the military record of John L. O'Mara and grant him an honorable discharge;

S. 3873. An act for the relief of Lewis F. Walsh;

S. 2194. An act to amend section 2288 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homestead entries;

S. 5072. An act to establish a fog signal and additional quarters at Point Loma Light Station, San Diego, Cal.;

S. 5074. An act to authorize the improvement of Santa Barbara Light Station, Cal., including a fog signal and a keeper's dwelling;

S. 318. An act to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Newcastle, Wyo.;

S. 4493. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Thermopolis, in the State of Wyoming;

S. 406. An act for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Vermilion, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 407. An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Madison, S. Dak.;

S. 954. An act for the acquisition of a site on which to erect a public building at Gilmer, Tex.;

S. 3831. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Denton, Tex.;

S. 4042. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at New Braunfels, Tex.;

S. 1175. An act to authorize the purchase of a site and erection of a public building at Astoria, Oreg.;

S. 1712. An act to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a public building thereon at Oregon City, Oreg.;

S. 4572. An act to designate Walhalla, Neche, and St. John, in the State of North Dakota, subports of entry, and to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, to said subports;

S. 4004. An act to authorize the use of the funds of certain Northern Cheyenne Indians;

S. 4999. An act for the relief of Francis M. Malone;

S. 4222. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Moundsville, W. Va.;

S. 2698. An act increasing the cost of erecting a post-office building at Plainfield, N. J.;

S. 4245. An act to increase the limit of cost of the additions to the public building at Salt Lake City, Utah;

S. 3716. An act for the erection of a public building at St. George, Utah;

S. 4619. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Franklin, State of Pennsylvania;

S. 4520. An act for the relief of Catherine Grimm;

S. 408. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Canton, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 4753. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 137);

S. 1752. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Eureka, Utah;

S. 4585. An act to provide for the erection of a public building on a site already acquired at South Bethlehem, Pa.;

S. 410. An act to provide for the acquisition of a site on which to erect a public building at Milbank, S. Dak.;

S. 876. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Bellefourche, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 100. An act to carry into effect the findings of the military board of officers in the case of George Ivers, administrator;

S. 2414. An act for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore;

S. 317. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sundance, in the State of Wyoming;

S. 3225. An act providing when patents shall issue to the purchaser or heirs of certain lands in the State of Oregon;

S. 2014. An act for the relief of George Owens, John J. Bradley, William M. Godfrey, Rudolph G. Ebert, Herschel Tupes, William H. Sage, Charles L. Tostevin, Alta B. Spaulding, and Grace E. Lewis;

S. 4655. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Franklin, in the State of New Hampshire;

S. 5207. An act to provide an American register for the steamer Oceana;

S. 4734. An act for the relief of Mary G. Brown and others;

S. 5255. An act increasing the compensation of the collector of customs, district of Puget Sound, State of Washington;

S. 2347. An act increasing the cost of erecting a post-office and courthouse building at Walla Walla, Wash.;

S. 4470. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Wenatchee, Wash.;

S. 5198. An act to authorize the issuance of patent to James W. Chrisman for the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 13, and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 24, township 29 north, range 113 west of the sixth principal meridian;

S. 3045. An act to provide for agricultural entries on oil lands; and

S. J. Res. 77. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Grand Army of the Republic encampment to be held at Pullman, Wash., in June, 1912.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19342. An act to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to isolated tracts of public land; and

H. R. 16661. An act to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands held under claim or color of title by individuals or private ownership or municipal ownership situated in the State of Alabama which were reserved, retained, or set apart to or for the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians under or by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Creek Tribe or Nation of Indians on March 24, 1832.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 17242. An act to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to cross the Government right of way along and adjacent to canal connecting the waters of Puget Sound with Lake Washington at Seattle, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 9845. An act to authorize the sale of burnt timber on the public lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17837. An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes";

H. R. 16680. An act to authorize the Board of County Commissioners of Baxter County and the Board of County Commissioners of Marion County, in the State of Arkansas, acting together for the two counties as bridge commissioners, to construct a bridge across the White River at or near the town of Cotter, Ark.; and

H. R. 18155. An act authorizing the town of Grand Rapids to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Itasca County, State of Minnesota.

THE EXCISE-TAX BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from New York consume some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, in view of its character and the circumstances under which it is presented the pending bill is one of exceptional importance. It comes as the companion piece of the bill which passed the House on Friday last repealing the duty on sugar and incidentally destroying the entire beet-sugar industry in the United States. There is invested now in beet-sugar production in this country in the neighborhood of $100,000,000 of capital, and the tariff on sugar yields to the Government an annual revenue of $53,000,000. If the sugar bill becomes a law, it is expected that this bill will likewise be enacted and will provide for the loss of revenue resulting from the enactment of the sugar bill. If the sugar bill should become a law and this bill should be defeated, or if it should be enacted and held to be invalid, there would be a deficit in the current revenues and the administration of the affairs of the Government would be seriously embarrassed. It would likely require the issue of bonds to secure revenue to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government.

FEDERAL POWER OF TAXATION.

The power of the Federal Government to impose taxes is clearly defined in the Constitution, and Congress has no authority whatever to exact tribute from persons, property, or business except as it is authorized by the Constitution. Under the Articles of Confederation there was no power in the General Government to impose taxes or to provide revenue to carry on its functions; it could only make estimates of the cost of administration and apportion the sum required among the several States and make requisitions upon them for their pro rata shares. Some of the States responded to the requisitions and others did not. The entire power of taxation, direct and indirect, including the imposition of customs duties, resided with the several States. The original confederacy was bound together by a rope of sand. It had no national vitality; it had no means of protecting its dignity or enforcing the few powers that were vested in it; hence the present Constitution.

THEORY OF DIRECT TAXATION.

In the making of the Constitution one of the chief purposes was to give the Federal Government sufficient authority to carry on the national functions and to enforce the national powers. It was fundamentally necessary for the General Government to have within its control means of raising adequate revenues for all Federal purposes, and the powers of taxation that were given to it were surrendered by the States. There was naturally some reluctance on the part of the States to surrender to or even to share with the General Government any of their taxing power. The result was a compromise under which the power of imposing customs duties for revenue purposes was vested exclusively in the National Government, and in addition to that the National Government was given the right to impose excise taxes concurrently with the States, and it was given the power of levying capitation or poll taxes and direct taxes on property on the condition that all capitation and direct taxes should be apportioned among the States on the basis of population. All other taxing powers were reserved to the States. The only condition imposed upon the Federal authorities in levying customs and excise taxes was that they should be uniform throughout the United States.

There has been considerable controversy in the courts as to what constitutes a direct tax on the one hand and an excise tax on the other hand. It is universally admitted that a general tax upon land and personal property is a direct tax, and can not be imposed by the Federal Government except under the apportionment rule. In the case of Pollock v. Farmers, etc., Co. (157 U. S., 429) the Supreme Court held that a tax on the income or rents and profits of real property was a tax upon the property itself, and therefore a direct tax in the sense of the Constitution and could only be imposed by apportionment. The court also held that an income tax covering interest on State and municipal bonds was invalid, because the Federal Government had no right to tax the instrumentalities and agencies in the administration of local government. The court was unanimous in holding the invalidity of an income tax covering the interest upon State and municipal bonds. The court was divided in holding that an income tax covering the rents, uses, and profits of real property was a tax upon the property and therefore a direct tax. Six members of the court held in the affirmative and two in the negative. Justice Jackson, who was a member of the court at that time, was ill and did not hear the arguments nor participate in the decision.

The question as to whether an income tax upon the interests and profits of invested personal property was a direct tax on the property and could only be levied by apportionment was left unsettled, the court being equally divided respecting it. Upon petition a rehearing was ordered upon that aspect of the case, and the question was finally decided in the affirmative. It was held that a tax upon the income, resulting from invested personal property, was a direct tax upon the property itself in the sense of the Constitution. This conclusion was reached by a divided court—five to four. That opinion is reported in the One hundred and fifty-eighth United States, page 601. There was considerable disappointment throughout the country over the decision in the Pollock case, and I confess I shared in the general feeling of dissatisfaction. I am a believer in a proper income tax. I have always felt that the Federal Government ought to have the power to levy a reasonable tax upon incomes whenever the exigencies of the Government might require it, and even as a part of the general revenue policy I believe it to be a just and equitable source of taxation.

THE INCOME-TAX DECISION.

I have studied somewhat critically the opinion of the court in the income-tax case, and as an original proposition the more study I give the opinion the more firmly convinced I am that the conclusion of the court in both opinions is sound from the standpoint of the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution had in mind the fact that the States would largely raise local revenues from a direct tax upon personal and real property. It was believed that this would be the chief source of local taxation, and the power granted to the Federal Government to impose a direct tax was granted upon condition that the Government should estimate the amount of revenue it might require from that source and apportion the sum among the States on the basis of population as shown by the preceding census. This plan was intended to give the States the right to contribute their pro rata share from their own revenues without complicating their local systems of taxation. This was regarded as a matter of much importance to the States. A direct tax imposed upon the same property by two different governments might involve embarrassment and unnecessary expense in enforcement. It was believed that the General Government would secure adequate revenues for ordinary purposes from customs and excise taxes, and would only have occasion to levy direct taxes in great national exigencies. With the power to levy and collect direct taxes vested in the Federal Government it was thought that the States would increase their local levies and pay their respective shares, and to enable them to do so the per capita basis of apportionment was fixed.

In the income-tax case the court held that a tax upon the uses, rents, and profits of real property and of invested personal property was a direct tax upon the property itself. Everybody knows that all there is of value in lands is the uses, rents, and incomes derived therefrom. It is a familiar rule of law that a grant of the uses, rents, and profits of land is a grant of the land itself. In the sense of the law the uses, rents, and profits of real property include the property itself. The same principle must hold true in relation to invested personal property. All there is of value in invested personal property is the income or the proceeds derived from its investment, and if the proceeds are taken away the property is valueless. The sale of the right to use a particular item of personal property, without condition or limitation, is a sale of the property itself and carries absolute title to it. It can hardly be supposed that the framers of the Constitution, in providing that a direct tax on property should be apportioned on the basis of population, intended to confer authority upon the Federal Government to impose a tax upon the uses, rents, and profits of property without regard to apportionment. It can not be supposed that men of such great ability and wide information as those who prepared the Constitution intended to prohibit a direct tax on property except upon the principle of apportionment, and yet give to the Government, without condition or limitation, the right to tax everything pertaining to the property that gives it value or desirability. The makers of the Constitution were guilty of no such folly as that. If that were the construction to be placed upon the Constitution, the apportionment limitation would be an empty husk. It would be a meaningless phrase. It would be absolutely barren of results. It would defeat the very purpose of the apportionment provision itself, and yet that provision was regarded as of sufficient importance to be inserted in the Constitution in two separate places.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I will permit a question.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman if he does not want to be interrupted. I was going to ask a question in relation to the kind of business last referred to, namely, looking after real estate, paying taxes, and looking after the collection of rents. Would not that be a business under the construction that the gentleman gives it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; because that is one of the inseparable and necessary incidents of property ownership. It is not business in the commercial sense or in the legal sense. It is one of the incidents of the ownership of property. That is my definition.

Whatever we may think of the soundness of the decision of the court in the income-tax case, it is the law, and it is the only guide this body has in determining its power to impose taxes for Federal revenues. It is the solemn duty of Congress to carefully consider its constitutional powers in the enactment of any and all legislation. This duty is more strongly emphasized at this particular time, since it is seriously contended in current politics that the Supreme Court should not be authorized to hold an act of Congress as unconstitutional except by the unanimous concurrence of all its members, because Congress is supposed to be composed of statesmen and lawyers, and they are expected to carefully investigate the constitutionality of every measure that comes up for consideration. If the pending bill should become a law and it should ultimately be held invalid, it would greatly embarrass the administration of the Government, and it is well for Congress to carefully and thoroughly consider the constitutional question before acting upon it finally.

There is no doubt that Congress has the power to impose business or privilege taxes upon corporations, joint-stock associations, and individuals alike, or it may tax corporations and joint-stock associations for the privilege of carrying on business and impose no tax upon individuals for carrying on the same kind of business. This authority is well established. Furthermore, a tax upon occupation, business, or privilege may be measured by the income from all sources of the corporations or individuals taxed. Under such a law the tax is not upon the property; it is upon the right or privilege of doing business. The matter of income is altogether incidental and is considered only for the purpose of determining the amount of tax that corporations or individuals shall pay for the particular privilege.

If the tax were imposed on the property itself, it would be a direct tax and could only be imposed by apportionment on the basis of population, but where it is levied upon the right or privilege of doing business it is purely an excise tax, and in the sense of the Constitution it is not a property tax, and therefore the amount may be fixed by means of the gross or net income of the taxpayer. It may be graduated according to the amount of the income, but if the law should be so construed as to hold that the tax in fact is levied upon the income itself, it would be a direct tax upon the property which is the source of the income, and would be invalid, unless apportioned as the Constitution requires. In imposing a purely business or privilege tax, and fixing the amount of the tax which each individual shall pay on an income basis, there may be included in the income revenues derived from State and municipal bonds and other sources which the Government has no power to tax. This source of income may be included in an excise tax on the ground that the tax is not upon the property itself. It is not levied upon the income from State and municipal bonds, but the proceeds of that class of bonds may be considered in determining how much tax each corporation or individual shall pay for the privilege of conducting business.

This question was settled by the Supreme Court in a very able and exhaustive opinion, rendered by Justice Day, in the case of Flint v. Stone-Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 107). If, however, the tax should be upon income from property that is not taxable instead of upon the right to do business or exercise certain privileges it would be invalid.

THE BILL PROVIDES AN INCOME TAX.

The question which I desire to bring to the attention of the House is whether the pending bill is an excise tax, a tax on business or privilege, or whether it is a tax upon incomes covering the proceeds of property which would make it a direct tax and therefore unconstitutional. In the end the question as to whether a tax is direct or indirect can only be determined by the nature of the law imposing it. This bill declares the proposed tax to be a special excise tax upon business.

The Supreme Court, in upholding the corporation-tax law of 1909, said:

> While the mere declaration contained in a statute, that it shall be regarded as a tax of a proper character, does not make it such, if it is apparent that it can not be so designated consistently within the meaning and effect of the act, nevertheless the declaration of the lawmaking power is entitled to much weight, and in this statute the intention is expressly declared to impose a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company. It is therefore apparent, giving all the words of the statute effect, that the tax is imposed not upon the franchises of the corporation irrespective of their use in business, nor upon the property of the corporation, but upon the doing of corporate or insurance business and with respect to the carrying on thereof.

"Giving all the words" of the pending bill effect, it clearly shows a purpose to tax incomes as such from all sources whatsoever under the guise of a "special excise" tax.

It includes all firms and individuals engaged in business and defines the word business as "everything about which a person can be employed, and all the activities which occupy the time, attention, and labor of persons for the purpose of a livelihood or profit."

There need be no relation between the business which is to be the subject of taxation and the income which is supposed to measure the amount of the tax. A person may be engaged in a business which yields no net income whatever, and yet if he owns real property or has invested personal property from which he derives a large income, that income will be subject to the tax, though it has no relation to the business which is the basis of the tax. Suppose the proposed tax were to be levied upon all persons who consume food and drink and the income of each individual should furnish the basis for the amount of the tax to be paid for the privilege of eating and drinking, would anybody contend that it would be valid under the income-tax decision? Though it might be labeled a "special excise" tax it would be an income tax pure and simple. Consuming food and drink is an activity which is conducted for a "livelihood," defined by lexicographers as a "means of supporting life."

The report accompanying the bill declares that the Committee on Ways and Means desires to go on record as favoring a general income tax, but refrains from reporting such a measure because of the decision of the Supreme Court holding such a tax invalid. Then, further along in the report, it is said:

As already stated, this bill, if enacted into law, will accomplish in the main all the purposes of a general income-tax law and at the same time escape the disapproval of the Supreme Court, as it keeps well within the principles laid down by that court in sustaining the constitutionality of the corporation-tax law.

It is the avowed purpose and intention of advocates of the measure to make it a general income-tax law so phrased as to avoid objections that would lie against a professed income-tax law. It is proposed to accomplish by indirection what can not be done directly. Are constitutional provisions so weak and flimsy that they can be violated in spirit and purpose by refinement in phraseology? Will a law creating a general income tax, in substance, as is claimed by the Ways and Means Committee for this bill, be upheld because it is disguised in the terminology of an excise tax?

PROPERTY OF IDLE RICH EXEMPT.

One who would be subject to the payment of the tax must be engaged in some kind of business for profit or for a livelihood. Under that provision the billions of dollars invested in valuable income-bearing real and personal property held by the idle rich would be exempt from taxation. Andrew Carnegie is generally understood to own upward of $300,000,000 of first-mortgage bonds upon the property of the United States Steel Corporation, from which he derives a revenue of twelve or fourteen million dollars a year. Would his income be subject to taxation under the provisions of the bill? If so, upon what basis? He is engaged in no business for a livelihood or for profit. His entire fortune is invested in real and personal property. The interest on his investments is paid periodically to his banker and placed to his credit. Where is the business basis of a tax upon his kingly income? The Astor family is understood to own hundreds of millions of dollars of valuable real property in the city of New York. The lessees pay rent to their bankers or agents. Members of that family are carrying on no business for a livelihood or for profit. They live upon the vast income from their landed property. They are engaged in no business that is subject to taxation under an excise law.

In the large cities of the country multiplied millions of dollars' worth of valuable lands are leased for long terms for stipuated rentals, and lessees are required to pay the periodical installments of rent to the lessors' bankers, where they are placed to their credit; and the lessors in many instances have no business at all, but live upon the income of the property.

Will this bill cover cases of that kind? It is the custom of many men of large wealth to provide by will that the property they leave shall be held and controlled by an executor or trustee and the proceeds be paid to the beneficiaries. Will this bill reach cases of that kind? The beneficiaries may have no business. They have nothing to say in relation to the management or investment of the property. They simply receive from the executor or trustee their respective shares of the income. The trustee can not be required to pay a tax upon an income of that kind unless the beneficiaries are subject to taxation. The trustee may be required to pay a tax upon his income, but he can not be required to pay a tax upon the income of the beneficiaries of the trust unless they are engaged in some kind of business.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], who opened the debate in favor of the bill, insisted that substantially all of these classes of wealth owners would be subject to the proposed tax, because it is necessary to look after invested personal property and rented lands, and that would constitute business under the definition given in the bill. He seems to believe that the cutting of interest coupons by bondholders and surrendering them on payment of installments of interest would be taxable business. Such acts are not business privileges, they are the necessary incidents of the ownership of property. They can not constitute business in the sense of that term as it is universally used. But the report, which carries the signatures of all the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, including the gentleman from Tennessee, admits, practically, that the classes I have enumerated would not be subject to taxation under the bill.

On page 7 of the report it is said:

Under the proposed law the citizen is not taxed upon his income nor is any tax measured by his income unless it be first shown that he is doing business within the meaning of the act. The very fact that some citizens, possessing large means, would under the proposed law escape taxation measured by their incomes, because they are not engaged in business, while unfortunate in its effect upon the revenues, is an added circumstance to show that this tax is an excise upon business and not a tax upon income. It is undoubtedly desirable that idle wealth should pay its share of taxation. Under the proposed law that portion of idle wealth, held by idle persons, will escape; but because the tax is measured by the income from all sources, idle wealth held by any person coming within the broad definition of persons doing business, as laid down by the Supreme Court and quoted in the proposed law, will be liable to this tax.

Gentlemen admit that incomes received from lands or invested personal property, by idle persons, would not be subject to the proposed tax either directly or indirectly. "Idle persons," under the bill, is construed to mean those not engaged in business. The owner of a farm who leases it for a period of 10 years, for instance, at a stipulated annual money rental, would not be engaged in "business" in the sense of the law or within the commercial meaning of that term, if he simply looked after the collection of his rent or visited the farm occasionally to see that it was properly cultivated and that improvements were kept in good condition. Those acts are necessary incidents of the ownership of property.

So it is admitted by the advocates of the bill that the fabulous fortunes of the unemployed rich will contribute nothing whatsoever to the raising of the revenue contemplated. They admit that the enormous burden of $60,000,000 a year will rest upon the shoulders of the enterprising, thrifty members of society who contribute greatly to the welfare of the people and to the glory of the country while the industrial drones "who toil not and neither do they spin," but who revel in luxury upon wealth they never did a thing to create or accumulate, will be entirely relieved from any share of the burden.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman has said there would be doubt as to whether it would be an income tax. Could it be any the less an income tax because it should be named an "excise tax"?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose not. It would be a debatable question. If it was a matter of serious doubt, the court would doubtless give Congress the benefit of the doubt and hold that it was within the exercise of its constitutional power. But what I am undertaking to show is that, considering all the provisions of the bill together, it is an income tax from its very nature, and I think if anything else is needed to ultimately and conclusively determine that question, it is found in section 5 of the bill, the section I propose to discuss now.

Mr. HAMMOND. Just another question. If, then, the name to be given to the tax will not determine its character, is it possible that this bill might be sustained as an income-tax bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, the gentleman is as good a judge of that possibility as I am.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have much respect for the gentleman's opinion, and I simply desired to ascertain if, in his opinion, supposing the Supreme Court as it is now constituted would sustain an income-tax law, it would be apt to refrain from sustaining this law simply because it is called an "excise-tax law"?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will come to that particular question later on in my speech and show why I think the court would not be justified in overruling that Pollock decision under all the circumstances surrounding the situation.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will await that with interest.

"COLLECTION AT THE SOURCE."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But if there should be any doubt that the proposed tax is an income tax, in its character and essence, that doubt must disappear in the face of provisions contained in section 5 of the bill. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of all paymasters and all disbursing officers under the Government of the United States, or persons in the employ thereof, when making any payment to any officers or persons as aforesaid, whose compensation is determined by a fixed salary, or upon settling or adjusting the accounts of such officers or persons, to deduct and withhold the aforesaid tax of 1 per cent, and the pay rolls, receipts, or accounts of officers or persons paying such tax as aforesaid shall be made to exhibit the fact of such payment. And it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, when auditing the accounts of any paymaster or disbursing officer, or any officer withholding his salary from moneys received by him, or when settling or adjusting the accounts of any such officers, to require evidence that the taxes mentioned in this act have been deducted and paid over to the Treasurer of the United States or other officer authorized to receive the same. Every person, firm, or corporation who pays to any officer, employee, or other person a salary or compensation, interest, or other accrued profits, exceeding $5,000 for a taxable year, every lessee or mortgagor of real or personal property who pays to the lessor or mortgagee interest or compensation exceeding $5,000 for a taxable year, and every trustee, executor, administrator, conservator, agent, or receiver employing any person or paying any person business earnings, within the meaning of this act, exceeding $5,000 for any taxable year, computed on the basis herein prescribed, shall make and render a return as provided herein to the collector or a deputy collector of his district, and shall deduct and withhold the tax herein imposed, and shall pay on said return the tax of 1 per cent per annum as required by this act: Provided, That any officer, employee, or other person for whom return has been made and the tax paid, as aforesaid, shall not be required to make a return unless such person has other net income, but only one deduction of $5,000 shall be made in the case of any such officer or employee: Provided further, That salaries paid to State, county, or municipal officers shall be exempt from the special excise tax herein levied: And provided further, That interest upon the bonds or other obligations of a State or any political subdivision thereof and also the proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured shall not be included in computing the net income of a person subject to the tax herein imposed: And provided further, That all property or its value passing by will or by intestate laws or transferred by deed or gift made or intended to take effect in possession after the death of the grantor, donor, testator, or ancestor shall be exempt from the operation of this law.

The happy idea of "collection at the source" embodied in that section was imported from England, where it has worked most beneficently as a feature of the English income-tax system for many years. It must be borne in mind, however, that the English law from which it was taken is a straight income-tax law. It imposes a tax directly upon incomes, while the tax proposed by this bill is a charge upon the privilege of doing business.

Advocates of this measure deny most vehemently that it is a tax upon incomes. They admit that if it were it would conflict with the Constitution and would be invalid. They contend that reference is had to incomes only incidentally and for the purpose of fixing the amount each individual shall pay for the privilege of carrying on business. The English income tax has always been classed as a direct tax. There is no constitutional provision in that country respecting direct taxes on incomes or other property.

If this bill should become a law an individual might be engaged in a small line of business that returned an income, say, of $1,000 a year. The business in and of itself would not be taxable, because the income was less than $5,000, but if the individual should be the owner of a valuable parcel of land in a large city, which he had leased for a long term of years at an annual net rental of $50,000, the business he was engaged in would be taxable. The amount of taxes he would be required to pay would be equivalent to 1 per cent upon his entire net income from all sources above $5,000. Keep in mind that the tax is not to be on the income, for that would be fatal, but it is to be on the business. It is imposed on account of the income, however, which bears no relation to the business, and section 5 of the bill provides that it shall be paid directly out of the income. It requires the lessee to report to the Government the amount of the annual rental and pay the tax out of the rental directly into the Federal Treasury and charge the amount against the lessor. The tax is imposed on account of the income from the realty. The bill proposes to give the Government a lien upon the income for the payment of the tax, and compels the lessee to subtract the tax directly from the income and pay it into the Treasury; and yet it is insisted that the proposed tax is upon the carrying on of business of some kind and not upon incomes at all. No flimsier fiction was ever suggested as a feature of legislation. The court held in the corporation-tax case that under a bona fide excise law, fixing the amount of the tax to be paid on the basis of the income of the taxpayer, interest on nontaxable bonds might be reckoned as part of the income, because the tax was not on the bonds nor on the interest therefrom, but on the privilege of conducting business. If the law had provided that the tax should be paid in whole or in part directly out of the interest on the nontaxable bonds, it would surely have been overthrown. Here it is freely admitted that the income from real property and invested personal property is not taxable, but it is proposed to collect the business tax, which is based upon such income, directly out of the nontaxable fund. The taxpayer is not even given the privilege of paying the tax out of any other money he may have. There is no escape from the conclusion that the proposed tax is a tax directly upon incomes, and, therefore, upon real and personal property which is the source of incomes.

The bill can not be labeled or disguised in any form or fashion so as to relieve it of the character of a direct tax upon the income of lands and invested personal property so long as it retains the "collection at the source" provision. That provision operates in every instance where the taxpayer may receive an income independent of his business, from rented lands or invested personal property, and it vitiates every feature of the measure, like a single disease germ will pollute a barrel of water.

TAX ON SALARIES OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

The bill imposes a tax upon official salaries, including the salaries of Federal judges. It contemplates that the performance of official service for the Government is a business or an activity pursued for a livelihood or for profit. The justices of the Supreme Court of the United States under this bill would be liable for the payment of a tax on their salaries in excess of $5,000 a year. Few of them have any outside incomes, and none of them has any active business. Upon the death of the lamented Justice Harlan it was ascertained that his estate was nominal. His entire source of livelihood was the salary he received as a member of the Supreme Court. The bill provides that official paymasters and disbursing officers shall withhold from the salaries of public officers, including Federal judges, the tax that may be due from them under its provisions. The proposed tax would amount to a direct reduction of official salaries to the amount of the sum required to be withheld. Instead of having the tax paid to the Government by the officer who may be subject to it, it is subtracted from his salary, and he is paid only the balance that may be due him.

Section 1, Article III, of the Constitution provides that:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Every Member of the House understands the purpose of that constitutional provision. The theory of our Government is to make the three great departments independent of each other. The provision preventing the reduction of the salaries of judges was calculated to make the courts independent of the legislative and executive departments. If Congress may fix an income tax upon the salaries of judges in excess of $5,000, it may impose an income tax upon the entire salaries. If Congress may levy a tax of 1 per cent upon the salaries of judges, it may impose a tax of 10 per cent, 25 per cent, or even 50 per cent. This is not a question of the amount of the tax, but a question of power to impose any such tax at all. The Constitution deprives Congress of the power, directly or indirectly, to reduce salaries of Federal judges during their continuance in office; and a tax of 1 per cent upon a salary in excess of $5,000 a year is as much a violation of the spirit and purpose of the constitutional prohibition as a tax of 25 per cent upon the entire salary would be. The great safeguards written in the Constitution to secure independence of the departments of Government and to protect life, liberty, and property can not be swept out of existence by refinement or subterfuge. There can be no doubt in the mind of any thinking person that the proposed tax upon the salaries of judges is in violation of the Constitution and utterly void. It seems that there are not two sides to that question.

REVERSAL OF THE POLLOCK DECISION.

We hear it said that the Supreme Court, with its present personnel, might, and likely would, overrule the decision in the income-tax case, and, if that should be done, the proposed measure would be upheld. It is a most unwise course for Congress to pursue—to base an important measure of legislation upon the supposition or the hope that the Supreme Court would overrule its latest decision upon the identical question involved. It is true that the present Chief Justice is the only member of the court who was a member when the income-tax case was decided. It is, furthermore, true that he was one of the dissenting justices against that decision; but the court decided the question, and since then Congress has proposed an amendment to the Constitution authorizing the imposition of an income tax, and that amendment is now pending with the legislatures of the several States. A substantial majority of them have already ratified it. Congress has accepted the decision of the Supreme Court in the income-tax case as final, and the court will doubtless follow that decision because it is sound and for the reason that if the people of the country desire that Congress shall have the power to impose an income tax, they may give it that power by ratifying the proposed amendment. It is altogether too precarious a hope to justify Congress in taking from the Treasury over $50,000,000 of revenue a year, to be provided if the court overrules its own decision.

PROVISIONS OF BILL INSEPARABLE.

If the courts should hold that the provisions of the bill intended to cover the unemployed rich, or any other of its provisions amount to a direct tax upon incomes from lands and invested personal property, and therefore void, will any portion of it stand? It seems clear that the provisions of the bill are not separable. They are interdependent. No court could say that Congress would have passed the law exempting from its operation the multiplied millions of dollars owned by men and women who have no vocation. How many Members of this House would vote for this bill if they believed that many immensely rich and unemployed people would be required to contribute no part of the revenues intended to be raised by it for carrying on the expenses of the Government? The question of the separation of provisions in the income-tax law was directly involved in the income-tax case, and the court held that unless valid provisions could be clearly separated from the invalid provisions the whole law would be held void. Unless it clearly appeared that Congress would have enacted the law with the objectionable provisions eliminated, the whole law would be overthrown. That must of necessity be the case with the pending bill. This is an important measure from every standpoint. It involves grave questions of constitutional authority and of public policy. This body, in the face of recent decisions of the Supreme Court, is not justified in enacting this bill into law, for it seems morally certain that it will ultimately be overthrown. I hesitate to charge the majority membership of this House with playing politics in a matter of such importance as this. I can not believe that they are proposing this measure and have put through the free-sugar bill in the expectation and the hope that neither will be enacted into law, but are designed for campaign purposes only. Therefore I appeal to them to reflect seriously upon the gravity of the question and to follow that course which is dictated by wisdom and safety. Do not put the Government in a position where it will be compelled to depend for means of subsistence upon the uncertain contingency that the Supreme Court will overrule one of its latest and most thoroughly considered decisions. I am opposed to the bill because I believe it is in conflict with the Constitution. I would oppose it, even if I believed it to be constitutional, because it proposes to tax the creators of wealth, the benefactors of humanity, and to exempt from any share of the burden the numerous idle holders of immense fortunes earned by the toil and sacrifice of others—a proposition which is repugnant to every conception of fairness and justice. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a somewhat singular condition exists in the consideration and discussion of this proposed law. It is in its essentials a limited income-tax law, in that it levies an impost on all incomes derived from business. It is defended and advocated as an income-tax law, and the arguments used to favor and sustain such a law are used here to induce its passage; and yet it is labeled an excise-tax law, and it is vehemently asserted that it is not, and must not be considered an income-tax law. Of course, nobody is deceived in this. It is known that for strictly political reasons it has been deemed good campaign strategy to take the tariff off from sugar. It is true that such a measure would destroy the beet-sugar interests of the North and West and obliterate the cane-sugar interests of the South, and that it would place us at the mercy of the Sugar Trust and compel us to depend upon foreign supplies for this great necessary article of food. But these considerations have little weight with gentlemen who hate the tariff and would strike it down whenever an opportunity occurs, and who think they can make the laboring classes believe that by the passage of such a law they would get cheaper food products and thus reduce the high cost of living.

But there was one great obstacle in the way. Already they had endeavored to strike down many of our sources of revenue, until it was apparent that nothing but a Republican President and Senate stood in the way of a large deficit and a consequent bond issue and the duty on sugar yielded $53,000,000 revenue. This could not be spared, and so to appear to make it up and to substitute that which would seem a popular for what they considered an unpopular tax this so-called excise law was proposed.

It is inherently defective, in that it is neither an excise nor an income tax, and it pretends to be both. It does not reach the very class of persons, the idle rich, the taxation of whom is the principal justification for an income tax, and it places the burden upon the middle-class business man or firm whose success and prosperity it should be the policy of Congress to foster. It does not reach the great corporations, who have absorbed so much of the wealth of the Nation and constitute the "interests" and the "big business" against which gentlemen on the other side thunder their denunciations. These great combinations of capital have already been taxed by a Republican measure, which now yields the Government $30,000,000 revenue. If our friends on the other side want more money, why do they not increase this tax? It has been declared constitutional. It is successfully enforced, and is a practicable scheme of taxation. The proposed measure is almost certainly unconstitutional, and it is utterly indefensible as a scheme of taxation. It will not reach the trust, but it will reach the independent manufacturer, who has been endeavoring to fight the trust. It will not reach the department stores of the great cities, but it will reach the fairly successful merchant in the smaller cities and larger towns. It will not reach the absentee landlord, but it will reach the successful farmer who by improved methods, industry, and frugality has just reached a period where he can claim that farming pays, and who is thereby encouraged to add to the food products of the Nation and in reality reduce the high cost of living. The Rockefellers, the Carnegies, and the Astors are not reached, for they have retired from business. It is only the energy and the thrift, the moderate success that is not a menace, and the fair measure of prosperity in business that ought to be encouraged that is burdened and penalized by this bill.

No real friend of an income tax should support this bill.

First. Because it is not an income tax and does not reach the persons who most of all should be burdened with such a tax.

Second. Because it is unconstitutional under the former decisions of the Supreme Court.

Third. Because the amendment to give this power to Congress is now pending, and unless delayed or prevented by the passage of this bill will almost certainly soon be adopted.

It is loudly asserted by the Democrats that they are in favor of an income tax. But it is not difficult to determine who are the real friends of that measure. The proposition to submit a constitutional amendment making possible the enactment of such a tax was made by a Republican President and passed by a Republican Senate and House. And now to obstruct or prevent or even delay the ratification by the States of that amendment is an act to defeat rather than to secure the passage of such a law.

While our friends claim for the present bill that it is almost as good as a general income-tax law they admit that it is but a makeshift. And were it not for the supposed political demand the honest, intelligent sentiment on that side of the House would never submit to the enactment of such a law. Now, on the eve, as it may fairly be said, of a ratification of the income-tax amendment to abandon the plain road and to take to an obscure and unexplored bypath would seem, to use no worse term, the height of folly.

The income-tax amendment was proposed by the President in 1909. It passed the Senate unanimously and the House by a vote of 317 to 14. It was ratified in 1910 by 9 States. It was ratified in 1911 by 21 States. It lacks the ratification now of only half a dozen States to become the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. There are 18 States from which to secure the favorable action of 6. Gentlemen who are honest with themselves must admit that the necessary ratifications are to say the least probable. It is suggested that the last half dozen are likely the most difficult to be secured. But on examination I find in the list of those which have not yet acted nothing that would warrant such a belief. The list is as follows:

Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

I believe that nearly every one of these States will ratify this amendment unless this bill becomes a law. Half of these States are claimed to be Democratic; but it needs only six, and the Republican States who have so far ratified the amendment outnumber the Democratic. But if the Democrats in States which have not yet ratified rest on the assurance of their Democratic brethren here that this bill is almost as good, they may well cease their efforts. And if Republicans believe that it will be unwise to trust Congress with a power they so unwisely use, they may well hesitate to act, and the amendment thereby be defeated.

The true friends of an income tax will pursue the path marked out by wisdom and an almost absolute certainty of success and not approve a course so devious and dangerous.

It is admitted that this proposed law is unconstitutional unless it is an excise tax.

By its terms it is a tax on incomes, and under its operation it would include income derived from real estate and personal property, and thus be a direct tax and subject to apportionment, unless it is within that exceptional class of taxation known as excises. It has been decided by our Supreme Court that when a law passed is clearly an excise the amount of the taxation and the determination of the classification may be measured by its income.

But this law is not an excise law, and it is impossible to force it into that class by so labeling it. And if it is not an excise, but a general law, it is clearly and unquestionably unconstitutional, because it imposes a tax upon incomes derived from real estate and personal property. This law proposes to tax all business. It is not specific, but general in its terms. An excise tax is not a general, but a specific tax, and when a law is passed which is in its nature a general law it can not be classed as an excise tax, because it is no longer a specific tax. Congress, by the terms of the Constitution, can pass an excise law, but it can not ecape the requirement of apportionment by labeling a law an excise when it is not. Congress has power to pass a specific tax on a particular thing or a particular activity, because it is then an excise; but it can not tax all business or activities, because that is not an excise, a specific, a particular tax, but a general law, and subject to the limitations of such a law.

It is asserted in the report of the committee that because you can tax one business or one form of business therefore you can tax all. That idea leaves out of consideration the essential nature of the power sought to be exercised. Congress is given power to levy an excise tax, subject only to the rule of uniformity; Congress is given the power also to levy a direct tax on property, but that must be done under the rule of apportionment by population. There has been no attempt made in this proposed law to apportion it among the States according to population. Hence if it is a direct tax on property it is unconstitutional. It has been held by our Supreme Court that a tax upon the income derived from real and personal property is in effect a tax upon the property itself and therefore a direct tax.

But an excise tax, if clearly so, is an exception, and Congress is given power to levy such tax. It may be a tax on property, and therefore direct; but if it is only levied on a particular property or thing or business, if it be exercised or cut off from the class, it is permitted under the power granted without being subject to the apportionment requirement. Thus liquor and tobacco are property. A tax on them is essentially a direct tax. But because they are excised, or cut off from the great bulk of property, a tax on them is permitted under the excise power and not the general power. But would gentlemen argue because we would tax liquor and tobacco and escape the requirement or apportionment that therefore we can tax all property and escape the requirement?

In essence and from its derivation (excidere—to cut off) it means a tax on specific things. Thus, in its other uses the word always means to cut off. The surgeon excises a portion of skin or a limb. We excise a word from its context. From the same derivation the word "excision" means that which is cut off, separated from the mass, taken from the whole.

As a method of taxation it was first adopted in England in 1643, in acknowledged imitation of the example of Holland. It was laid upon particular enumerated articles, and later upon particular enumerated trades and callings. It was from the first very unpopular. It was defined by Dr. Johnson, the great English lexicographer, as "a hateful tax." This opinion was evidently shared by Blackstone who, after enumerating the articles subject to the tax, said that it was "a list which no friend of his country would wish to see further increased."

This has always been and is now the meaning and use of the word in England from whence we derived it. Thus Churchill wrote:

> No statesman e'er will find it worth his pains
> To tax our labors and excise our brains.

Coming now to its use on this side of the Atlantic we find the word well known and the practice odious in the minds of the colonists, who justified their Revolution because of what they justly considered an unwarranted imposition of an excise tax on tea and other specified commodities. But while it was odious it was considered by the framers as a necessary power of Government, and so Congress was given the power to pass excise laws. Almost the first endeavor to use such power led to the whisky rebellion, and to this day the excise on liquor is considered an unjust and an unholy tax by those who are compelled to pay it. But all through these years, and in every instance of its application, the tax maintained its characteristic as a limited, a particular, a specific tax. Thus Thomas Jefferson, referring to the liquor tax, said:

> An excise is a duty paid in the hands of the consumer or retailer, but in Massachusetts they have perverted the word "excise" to mean a tax on all liquors.

Imagine his surprise if he could know that his Democratic followers were insisting upon a perversion of the word which would give Congress the unlimited power to tax anything and everything by simply calling it an excise.

But no such meaning or use of the word as that now contended for has been sanctioned by any American court. The word "excise" has been often defined by the courts of both the States and the Nation, but always in consonance with its historic origin and use. The text writers on the Constitution and on taxation have so understood and so defined it. There is not anywhere to be found, either in the decisions of the courts or in the discussion of its principles by jurists, a single statement that would justify the use of the werd or the principle as attempted and intended by this bill.

In Maine v. Grand Trunk Railway (142 U. S., 217) the Supreme Court of the United States said an excise tax "denotes an impost for a license to pursue certain callings or to deal in special commodities or to exercise particular franchises." In Patton v. Brady (184 U. S., 608) the Supreme Court had under consideration the validity of the tobacco-tax law of 1898, which levied an imposition of 12 cents a pound upon all tobacco and snuff. In determining the validity of that law they discussed somewhat at length the nature and definition of an excise law, and I desire to quote from the opinion which was rendered by Brewer, J., beginning on page 617:

> Ever since the early part of the Civil War there has been a body of legislation, gathered in the statutes under the title "Internal revenue," by which upon goods intended for consumption excises have been imposed in different forms at some time intermediate the beginning of manufacture or production and the act of consumption. Among the articles thus subjected to those excises have been liquors and tobacco, appropriately selected therefor on the ground that they are not a part of the essential food supply of the Nation but are among its comforts and luxuries. The first of these acts, passed on July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 432), in terms provided for "the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes imposed by this act," and included manufactured tobacco of all descriptions. Subsequent statutes changed the amount of the charge, the act of 1890 reducing it to 6 cent a pound. Then came the act in question, which, for the purpose of providing means for the expenditures of the Spanish War, increased the charge to 12 cents a pound, specifying distinctly that it was to be "in lieu of the tax now imposed by law." Nothing can be clearer than that in these various statutes, the last included among the number, Congress was intending to keep alive a body of excise charges on tobacco, spirits, etc. It may be that all the taxes enumerated in these various statutes were not excises, but the great body of them, including the tax on tobacco, were plainly excises within any accepted definition of the term.
> Turning to Blackstone, volume 1, page 318, we find an excise defined "An inland imposition paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity or frequently upon the retail sale, which is the last stage before the consumption." This definition is accepted by Story in his Constitution of the United States, section 953. Cooley, in his work on Taxation, page 3, defines it as "an inland impost levied upon articles of manufacture or sale and also upon licenses to pursue certain trades or to deal in certain commodities." Bouvier and Black, respectively, in their dictionaries give the same definition. If we turn to the general dictionaries, Webster's International calls it "an inland duty or impost operating as an indirect tax on the consumer levied upon certain specified articles, as tobacco, ale, spirits, etc., grown or manufactured in the country. It is also levied on licenses to pursue certain trades and deal in certain commodities." The definition in the Century Dictionary is substantially the same, though in addition this is quoted from Andrews on Revised Law, section 133: "'Excises' is a word generally used in contradistinction to imposts in its restricted sense and is applied to internal or inland impositions levied sometimes upon the consumption of a commodity, sometimes upon the retail sale of it, and sometimes upon the manufacture of it."

The same view is taken by the Supreme Court in the late corporation-tax case (Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S., 107). In that case Mr. Justice Day, for a unanimous court, in rendering the decision sustained the law because, he said, it—> may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity, i. e., with the advantages which arise from corporate or quasi corporate organization, or when applied to insurance companies for doing the business of such companies.

The gentlemen who defend the bill meet none of these propositions in argument, but they say their measure is justified and sustainable under the Spreckels and the corporation-tax cases. An examination of these cases will not only furnish no support for such a contention, but will sustain and strengthen the position I have sought to establish.

In Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain (192 U. S., 397) the Supreme Court had before it the question of the validity of the law of 1898, which provided:

> That every person, firm, corporation, or company carrying on or doing the business of refining petroleum or refining sugar or owning or controlling any pipe line for transporting oil or other products whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000 shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax equivalent to one-quarter of 1 per cent on the gross amount of all receipts of such persons, firms, corporations, and companies in their respective business in excess of said sum of $250,000.

The court held it to be a special excise tax on the particular business of refining oil and sugar. Justice Harlan, rendering the opinion, says:

> The contention of the Government is that the tax is not a direct tax, but only an excise imposed by Congress under its power to lay and collect excises which shall be uniform throughout the United States. Clearly the tax is not imposed upon gross annual receipts as property, but only in respect of the carrying on or doing the business of refining sugar. It can not be otherwise regarded, because of the fact that the amount of the tax is measured by the amount of the gross annual receipts. The tax is defined in the act as "a special excise tax," and therefore it must be assumed for what it is worth, that Congress had no purpose to exceed its powers under the Constitution, but only to exercise the authority delegated to it of laying and collecting excises.

It will be seen that this decision holds that a tax on a particular business is an excise. But it is not an authority for the contention that a general tax on all business is an excise.

In Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 107), known as the corporation-tax case, the Supreme Court considered the law of 1909 taxing corporations, the material part of which is as follows:

SEC. 38. That every corporation, joint stock company or association organized for profit and having a capital stock represented by shares, and every insurance company now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory of the United States or under the acts of Congress applicable to Alaska or the District of Columbia, or now or hereafter organized under the laws of any foreign country and engaged in business in any State or Territory of the United States or in Alaska or in the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation, joint stock company or association, or insurance company equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it from all sources during such year, exclusive of amounts received by it as dividends upon stock of other corporations.

It will be noticed that by the terms of the law itself the tax was to be imposed "with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation"—that is, the right to do business in a particular way, to wit, the corporate form was taxed, and the court held the law an excise and not a direct tax.

That was in accordance with the original purpose. President Taft, in his message to Congress proposing the law and urging its passage, said:

The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain seems clearly to establish the principle that such a tax as this is an excise tax upon privilege and not a direct tax upon property, and is within the Federal power without apportionment according to population. This is an excise tax upon the privilege of doing business as an official entity and of freedom from general partnership liability enjoyed by those who own the stock.

The Supreme Court took that view and sustained the act as an excise law "on the privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity." This is made clear by reiterated statements in the decision. Thus, on page 145:

It is therefore apparent, giving all the words of the statute effect, that the tax is imposed not upon the franchises of the corporation, irrespective of their use in business nor upon the property of the corporation, but upon the doing of corporate or insurance business and with respect to the carrying on thereof, in a sum equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received from all sources during the year; that is, when imposed in this manner it is a tax upon the doing of business with the advantages which inhere in the peculiarities of corporate or joint-stock organizations of the character described. As the latter organizations share many benefits of corporate organization, it may be described generally as a tax upon the doing of business in a corporate capacity. In the case of the insurance companies the tax is imposed upon the transaction of such business by companies organized under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory, as heretofore stated.

Again, on page 150:

Within the category of indirect taxation, as we shall have further occasion to show, is embraced a tax upon business done in a corporate capacity, which is the subject matter of the tax imposed in the act under consideration. The Pollock case construed the tax there levied as direct, because it was imposed upon property simply because of its ownership. In the present case the tax is not payable unless there be a carrying on or doing of business in the designated capacity, and this is made the occasion for the tax, measured by the standard prescribed. The difference between the acts is not merely nominal, but rests upon substantial differences between the mere ownership of property and the actual doing of business in a certain way.

Also, on page 155:

While the tax in this case, as we have construed the statute, is imposed upon the exercise of the privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity as such business is done under authority of State franchises, it becomes necessary to consider in this connection the right of the Federal Government to tax the activities of private corporations which arise from the exercise of franchises granted by the State in creating and conferring powers upon such corporations.

Also, on page 158:

In levying excise taxes the most ample authority has been recognized from the beginning to select some and omit other possible subjects of taxation, to select one calling and omit another, to tax one class of property and to forbear to tax another. For examples of such taxation see cases in the margin decided in this court upholding the power.

Also, on page 165:

It is therefore well settled by the decisions of this court that when the sovereign authority has exercised the right to tax a legitimate subject of taxation as an exercise of a franchise or privilege it is no objection that the measure of taxation is found in the income produced in part from property which of itself considered is nontaxable. Applying that doctrine to this case, the measure of taxation being the income of the corporation from all sources, as this is but the measure of a privilege tax within the lawful authority of Congress to impose, it is no valid objection that this measure includes, in part at least, property which as such could not be directly taxed. See in this connection Maine v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. (142 U. S., 217), as interpreted in Galveston, Harrisonburg & San Antonio Ry. Co. v. Texas (210 U. S., 217, 226).

It is contended that measurement of the tax by the net income of the corporation or company received by it from all sources is not only unequal but so arbitrary and baseless as to fall outside of the authority of the taxing power. But is this so? Conceding the power of Congress to tax the business activities of private corporations, including, as in this case, the privilege of carrying on business in a corporate capacity, the tax must be measured by some standard, and none can be chosen which will operate with absolute justice and equality upon all corporations.

The corporation-tax law was intended to be and was held to be a tax upon the doing of business in a particular manner, to wit, in a corporate capacity, and was therefore an excise law. How this can be considered as an authority to tax all business it is impossible to understand.

The Spreckels case was a tax on a particular business, and therefore properly held an excise tax.

The corporation-tax case was a tax on a particular manner of carrying on business, and therefore properly held an excise tax.

The proposed law is neither. It is not a tax on a particular business, nor a particular manner of doing business, but it is a general tax on all business. Such a law was never held to be and is not an excise law.

CONCLUSION.

After all, is it a wise policy, gentlemen on the other side, to play politics when the great, the vital interests of the Nation are concerned? It has been popular to denounce corporate greed and "the interests" and "idle wealth." There has been a large measure of justification in this. But if you refuse, when the power is yours and the way is easy, to further tax the great corporations against which you thunder your denunciations, if you refuse to follow the constitutional course by which you can reach the "idle rich" whom you have been so fond of lashing with the scorpion whip of your invective, will not the people believe that your attitude has been and is but a pretense, and your words mere sound and fury, signifying nothing?

It is exceedingly probable, nay it is almost certain, that when the people of the country come to consider the real merits of these twin propositions of unwisdom, they will condemn rather than approve. If upon such issues the Democratic Party proposes to appeal to the electorate this fall, we welcome the contest; for there is little doubt the American people will reject such propositions and repudiate the party which supports them. [Applause.]

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration by the House, to levy a Federal excise tax upon the carrying on or doing business by all persons in the United States, is simply an extension of the principle underlying the corporation tax, made a part of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill at the instance of President Taft and the Republican Party managers in Congress in 1909, and now a part of the revenue system of the country. The active opponents of the extension of that tax to persons are the same class of people who, at various times and in manifold and devious ways, have opposed every scheme for taxation by the Federal Government which seeks to distribute the burden of taxation with due regard for the ability of all the people to pay.

The Federal corporation-tax law of 1909 provides that every corporation engaged in business in any State or Territory of the United States shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business by such corporation equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000, and the law then merely provides the method of ascertaining the income and the machinery for the collection of the tax.

The bill now under consideration simply extends the special excise tax on corporations and provides that every person, firm, or copartnership residing in the United States or any Territory thereof shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business by such person equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000. The bill defines the term "business" and then provides the method of ascertaining the income of the person doing business and the machinery for the collection of the tax.

There are two questions involved in the proper consideration of the bill. First, is it a valid exercise of the taxing power of the Congress under the constitutional provision for collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for the support of the Federal Government? Second, is it an equitable tax, having due regard for the proper method and distribution of taxation by the Federal Government among the people of the United States?

Taking up the first question, the constitutional aspect of this proposed extension of the corporation excise tax has been so ably discussed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] in presenting the bill to the House, and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON], that it seems almost trite to refer in detail to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court which bear upon the subject. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I desire to urge in my own way the real significance of the more important of those decisions.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall apportion direct taxes among the States, and that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census directed to be taken. (Art. I, sec. 2, cl. 3, and Art. I, sec. 9, cl. 4.) From the formation of the Constitution down to 1894 the unbroken doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States was that there were but two kinds of direct tax—the capitation tax, expressly named, and a tax on land.

Under the second Cleveland administration the Wilson law was passed in 1894, placing a tax upon the net incomes, as incomes, of all persons and corporations. The constitutionality of this law was attacked, as this House knows, and the question was decided in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429).

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in abusing the courts, but, having due regard for the right of the citizen to criticize freely any branch of this Government, I make bold to say that no decision since the troublous days of the slavery agitation before, during, and shortly after the war has been so generally or so justly condemned as that of the Pollock case. The Supreme Court, by a bare majority of five to four, overturned the precedents of a century, and a single judge overturned himself in a night to accomplish that result.

Now, the opponents of the pending excise-tax bill seize upon the Pollock case and assert upon its authority that the proposed tax is merely an income tax under another name, and is, consequently, unconstitutional because it seeks to levy a direct tax on incomes without apportionment among the States according to population. But taking the Pollock case as an authority for what it actually decided—while expressing here the belief that it will be destroyed as a precedent as soon as necessary by a sounder and a broader Supreme Court—and remembering that the law there under consideration was a plain provision to tax incomes, wholly unrelated to business, let us see the language of Chief Justice Fuller:

> We have considered the act only in respect of the tax on income derived from real estate and from invested personal property, and have not commented on so much of it as bears on gains or profits from business, privileges, or employments, in view of the instances in which taxation on business, privileges, or employments has assumed the guise of an excise tax and been sustained as such. (158 U. S., p. 635.)

And it is, of course, known by the lawyers of this House that the court left subject to taxation certain restricted classes of incomes. The Pollock case is bad reasoning, and the dissenting opinions are the logical and unanswerable ones; but, even then, all that the case decided was that a tax on incomes from real and personal property was a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution. It said nothing against a tax on incomes from business. In fact, the Chief Justice, in this case, further said:

> We do not mean to say that an act laying by apportionment a direct tax on all real estate or personal property, or the income thereof, might not also lay excise taxes on business, privileges, employments, and vocations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States must be presumed to act constitutionally. It is a co-ordinate branch of the Government of the United States, and its acts must always be so construed as to determine, if possible, that they are within the limits of the Constitution.

In fact there has been lost sight of, in criticizing this bill, the difference between the validity of a law and the extent of its application. The Supreme Court has always upheld Federal tax laws where it could constitutionally apply them to classes of persons and fields of taxation, even if other persons and property have to be exempt.

The precise judicial construction of the word "business," the nature of its application, and the consequent extent of the excise tax must be for the court. I can only say that with the wide meaning of the word "business" given in the proposed law there is little income in the United States not derived therefrom.

Moreover, we have had in this country an imperceptible but steady growth of unwritten constitutional law. The doctrine of due process of law has been expanded to meet the varying needs of a complex civilization; other sections of the Constitution have been restricted beyond the dream of the fathers to meet the exigencies of our Territories beyond the seas. I believe the widely diversified industries, the varying activities and extent of capital, and the great disparity in the population of the States will impel the Supreme Court, if necessary, to return to the doctrine of Marshall and the other early expounders of the Constitution and hold that only capitation and land taxes are direct taxes requiring apportionment among the States.

As showing how careful was the majority of the court in the Pollock case not to extend the application of its opinion beyond the point necessary to destroy the value of the broad income tax then before it, I want to call to the attention of the House the fact that they attempted to distinguish and did not overrule the case—Springer v. United States (102 U. S.)—where a tax—> upon the annual gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, issues, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever—was held to be an excise tax and not a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and was upheld by the court.

In Nicol v. Ames (173 U. S.) the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the war revenue act of 1898, requiring a memorandum of every sale at any exchange or board of trade or other similar place and the affixing of a revenue stamp to such memorandum. The court, after holding that such a tax was not a direct tax, held that sales of that sort could be classified by themselves and apart from other sales, and could therefore properly be selected for a special tax, because of the obvious and peculiar privilege and facility of making a sale at a place where there was the best opportunity for a demand, a price, and dispatch in the transaction of business. Recalling the language of Chief Justice Fuller in the Pollock case that there is no Federal tax which is not a direct tax that is not included under the words "duties, imposts, and excises," it is clear to understand that the tax held valid in Nicol v. Ames was an excise tax.

The Spanish War revenue laws brought many cases to the Supreme Court, and in order to see how firmly that court adheres to its position on excise taxes, I want to refer to Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain (192 U. S.). In that case the statute imposed an excise upon "all persons and companies carrying on or doing the business of refining petroleum or refining sugar or owning any pipe line transporting oil or other products, whose gross annual receipts exceed $250,000 shall be subject to pay a special excise tax," and so forth. In deciding the validity of that act the court says:

> The tax is defined in the act as a special excise tax, and therefore it must be assumed for what it is worth that Congress had no purpose to exceed its powers under the Constitution, but only to exercise the authority granted to it of laying and collecting excise.

And in this same case it is well to note that the court very effectively destroyed the argument that a tax of the character of the tax sought to be imposed by the present bill is an income tax by a statement regarding the decision in the Pollock case, for the court in that respect said:

> It is said that if regard be had to the decision in the income-tax cases a different conclusion from that just stated must be reached. On the contrary, the precise question here was not intended to be decided in those cases.

In 1909 the existing corporation-tax law was passed as a part of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. That act, as I have stated, provided an excise tax with respect to doing business by corporations. Soon after it went into effect its validity was brought into question in the Supreme Court in the case of Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S.), where a unanimous opinion of the court held that this form of tax applied to corporations was unquestionably valid.

Notwithstanding attempts to circumscribe the purpose and effect of that decision, in my judgment as a lawyer there is nothing in the opinion of the court to indicate that a broadening of the field of operation of such a tax might make it of doubtful constitutionality. The court, among other things in that case, said:

> The revenue of the United States must be obtained from the same territory and the same people and its excise tax collected from the same activities as are also reached by the States to support their local governments, and this fact must be considered in determining whether there are any implied limitations on the Federal power to tax because of the sovereignty of the States over matters within their exclusive jurisdiction.

In other words, as I read the opinion in the Flint case, the court meant to permit the proper and constitutional kind of an excise tax to be levied upon all business activities, whether they shall be personal or corporate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at the time the Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. case was argued in the Supreme Court it was urged as the chief objection to the law that a tax claimed to be an excise tax, levied upon every conceivable business occupation or calling in which any individual, copartnership, joint-stock association, or corporation may engage, was limited to those only who carry on such business in joint-stock or corporate form, and with the result that one competitor in a particular line of business had imposed upon it a burden that was not imposed upon other competitors in the same line. The case was the leader in a group representing the vast corporate activities of the United States and the ablest counsel in the land appeared to attack the law. I have examined the very able brief of Mr. Maxwell Evarts, of New York, general counsel of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., filed in the case, and I find that it was elaborately argued that the law invaded the sovereignty of the States; that it was a deprivation of property without due process of law; that it denied to persons the equal protection of the laws; and that by taking away that privacy of its affairs which is a part of the business property of a corporation it took private property for public use without compensation. But that the tax might be a direct tax was barely adverted to, and then only to assert that it was such a tax if it applied directly to the corporate franchise. And, Mr. Chairman, better than all, I find in that remarkable brief this admitted statement:

The taxing power of the Federal Government may reach the business of the defendant corporation for 2 per cent, for 10 per cent, for 50 per cent, if necessary, if it will but seek out all who are engaged in the same business and not attempt to tax the corporate franchise.

In other words, the real argument in the Flint case was that the corporation tax was a discriminating tax because it did not reach individuals who were business competitors of corporations, and consequently was invalid. It was generally conceded that if its application had been to all persons, natural as well as artificial, it would have been valid. The court held that even with the restriction, being uniform in its operation all over the United States upon the classes it reached, it was a constitutional tax. Can it then be seriously urged that the extension of this tax by a Democratic House is other than a wise as well as constitutional act?

The true construction of an act may often be gotten by examining the purposes and views of those responsible for it. The corporation-tax law was introduced in the Senate and there was wide and thoughtful discussion upon it. In this House it was voted on merely as a part of a conference report upon the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill in the closing days of a congressional session. With remarkable force the able lawyers in the Senate who debated the amendment to the Payne-Aldrich bill providing that tax conceded the constitutional power to extend it to all persons.

During the debate on June 30, 1909, there was a colloquy between Senator ROOT and Senator BAILEY, as follows:

Senator ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Texas if I am right in inferring from the statement which he has just made that he does not seriously question the constitutional power of the Congress to impose this tax on corporations?

Senator BAILEY. Mr. President, I answer the Senator frankly that I do not. I believe that Congress can tax all red-headed men engaged in a given line of business if it pleases. I think it would be a very foolish thing to do; but I have no doubt if the tax fell upon every red-headed man in Massachusetts the same as in Mississippi or in Texas and all other States, the law imposing such a tax would be perfectly valid. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 61st Cong., p. 4251.)

On July 1, with the debate still in progress, we find the assertion:

Senator BORAH. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] will observe that I am not questioning the constitutionality of this tax. * * * But I suggest this proposition as well worthy of the attention of the great legal acumen of the Senator from New York; that the power which enables us to lay this tax is such a power as does not require us to make the discrimination which is made in this amendment. If we have the power to make the classification which is made in this amendment we have the power to extend that classification.

On July 2 there was general discussion between Senators CUMMINS, ROOT, RAYNER, and others, and answering a question of Senator CUMMINS whether or not he had any doubt that the proposed corporation tax could be constitutionally extended to individuals, Senator RAYNER said:

I do not; not the slightest. I think you can tax the privileges of an individual the same, and they are doing it. The Government is taxing special occupations. Take the tobacco and distillery cases. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 61st Cong., p 4095.)

The next day, July 3, in answering a question by Senator SUTHERLAND, Senator CUMMINS said:

Yes; I am fairly familiar with that statement by the justice who wrote the opinion (referring to opinion in Spreckels case). It sustains a tax upon a certain business. I have no doubt about the right of Congress to levy a tax upon business, whether it is a blacksmith, or whether it is a shoemaker, or whether it is a sugar refiner. It is in the wisdom and discretion of Congress to select those kinds of business which can best, in its opinion, bear the burdens of an excise tax. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 61st Cong., p. 4246.)

Mr. Chairman, I have gone at some length into this matter, but the preservation unimpaired by this House of the taxing power of the Government is of vital importance. In the face of the explicit decisions of the Supreme Court as to the right to tax business and business incomes as excises, with this class of taxes carefully excluded from the majority opinion holding the income tax invalid in the Pollock case, with the admission of the constitutionality of such a tax as the corporation tax, if extended to individuals, made by the counsel who in the Supreme Court assailed that tax, with the constitutional right to extend the tax conceded by the able Senators who debated the law applying it to corporations, I assert that the broad statesmanship of the Democratic Party is amply supported by authority and its judgment will be upheld by the courts.

The second question involved in this bill is, therefore, Mr. Chairman, the one vital question before the House. Is the proposed tax a fair one; is it equitable having due regard for the proper method and distribution of taxation by the Federal Government among the people of the United States? All economists agree that the ideal system of taxation is one under which men pay the expenses of the Government in proportion to their faculty or ability, and since income from business is by all means the best single mark of such ability an excise tax upon the carrying on or doing business, to be measured by the net income from the business of the person taxed, is the fairest and most equitably distributed tax which can be used in the United States short of a straight income tax.

No scheme of taxation can be devised which will reach every person who ought to pay taxes in a country as large as the United States, but if the plan reaches substantially all the people and places the burdens of taxation upon them in the manner in which I have just stated that all taxes ought to be laid—that is, with due regard for the ability of persons to pay—it is a scheme of taxation that is not merely sound, it is just. And for years the barons of special privilege through an iniquitous protective tariff and other forms of governmental favoritism have seen the burdens of government fall upon the consumer of the land without regard to his humble station and slender means, while they have basked in the sunshine of Republican power and have flitted like will-o'-the-wisps before the eyes of an outraged and overburdened public, untaxable, unassessable, unreachable.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, it is now cunningly argued by some Republicans here that the present excise-tax bill is unfair because the enforcement of the law, if it be enacted, will not reach the so-called idle wealth of the country while it taxes the great earnings from the industrial activities of our people. It may be that a very few people with great incomes will escape this tax. But I venture the assertion that more than nine-tenths of the material wealth of America that produces to its possessors an income each year in excess of $5,000 is held by people and corporations who are engaged in business within the meaning of even a circumscribed construction of the language of the present bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] saw fit to criticise the bill by urging that it permitted the aggregated wealth of a Rockefeller, of a Carnegie, and an Astor to escape taxation, while it bore down upon the activities of the man who is advancing industrial prosperity in America, but he failed to tell the whole story. He failed to tell the fact that while the very restricted class to whom belong the men he named may possibly be exempt, that yet there will come the taxation of the enormous incomes from the business activities of a Morgan and a Ryan and a Hill and a Schiff and a Gould and a Perkins, and a host of others who to-day are amassing inordinate sums from the American people through skillfully contrived special privileges and through the iniquitous system of tariff legislation imposed upon the poor people of America, and that such men are now escaping taxation themselves because of their alliance with and protection by that stand-pat reactionary Republican organization of which the gentleman from Ohio is a loyal member.

It is unfortunate that some scheme has not been devised by which the class of people who "toil not, neither do they spin," shall be subjected to their full share of taxation in America, but it is not the fault of the Democratic Party that such is not the case. That party has firmly and resolutely stood for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall make possible the taxation directly of all incomes in the United States. In the report to the House on the present bill the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means specifically state that they desire to go on record as favoring an income-tax law; and they state that the enactment of the present bill will aid in preparing the public mind for a fuller appreciation of the justice and desirability of the income tax and hasten the adoption of the proposed income-tax amendment to the Federal Constitution. On the other hand, the Republican Party, true to its traditions as the representative of and the sponsor for the privileged classes of America, has stood firmly in the way of that great tax reform until some of its leaders within a brief period have seen gathering the storm of opposition about them and yielded to the inevitable.

And, moreover, Mr. Chairman, there should not again come from the other side of this Chamber any argument against the proposed excise tax because of its failure to be universal in its application. That party has continued in power by a system of taxation that has been the reverse of universal. It has thrived upon the results of the burdens of taxation placed inequitably upon the consumers of America. And I want to show that when the subject of a proper tax on business and other incomes was under discussion during the Republican ascendency in this House no question of the universality of application of a proposed law actuated the Republican Party. On the 25th of March, 1909, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, a stand-pat Republican, for whose personal integrity and soundness of judgment I have great respect, in discussing President Taft's supposed advocacy of an income tax, stated:

I think most of us realize that the time is rapidly approaching when this Federal Government can no longer expect to derive its full income to defray the vast expense of carrying on its varied operations entirely from the consuming capacity of the people.

And he stated his purpose to introduce a bill which would provide for a tax on real-estate incomes, and in another section for a tax on the incomes from personal property, and so on in separate sections to apply his tax to various classes of persons and various fields of taxation, and to include in each section a provision which would declare that the validity of that particular section should not affect the balance of the provisions of the act. He stated to the House that he had laid this sort of legislation before President Taft and that the President approved of it. Now, the effect of such legislation as proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota would simply be to provide a scheme of income taxation enumerating all of the different classes of people and property whether engaged in business activities or not, and subject them to an income tax from all of the sources of their income, and then, no matter how much the Supreme Court might narrow the operation of the law, he would still leave to be taxed the classes of people and businesses which the court determined were properly subject to taxation. I did not at that time, nor have I since, heard that a single Republican in this House objected to that scheme of taxation upon the theory that it did not provide at all hazards for reaching the last man in the United States who had an income which might be subject to taxation at the hands of the Federal Government.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the stand-pat element of the Republican Party to-day is fighting this tax because it knows, as the country knows, that the great bulk of it will be paid by the individuals who, engaged largely in the same activities as are the corporations now paying this tax, have enjoyed and are still enjoying the enormous benefits and special privileges which have come to them through their corrupt alliance with the Republican Party.

Talking about fairness and equity in taxing the people, the trouble is that the wealth of the country has so long compelled this Nation of 90,000,000 freemen to worship in the temple of inequality and injustice that it views with impotent frenzy the swelling, irresistible demand for the readjustment of the national taxing system on the sound basis of equality and justice. For the last 40 years the predatory interests which have maintained a close partnership between business and Government have, in fact, forced the honest yeomanry of the land to enrich the coffers of those interests, and at the same time pay the bulk of the taxes, so that their very life history may be found in the lines of the western poet, who describes the lot of the farmer of the Plains:

His horses and mules had all gone lame,
And he lost his cows in a poker game.
A cyclone came and blew down his barn;
Then an earthquake swallowed up his farm,
But the tax collector came around
And taxed him on his hole in the ground.

The report accompanying the present bill shows that over $700,000,000 in taxes were collected from the people of the United States in 1911, and every dollar of it was a tax upon consumption. It was a burden which fell with substantial evenness of levy upon every man, woman, and child in the land. The articles embraced within the tax provisions of the customs and the internal-revenue laws of the United States are those which all people, poor as well as rich, use to at least appreciably the same extent. The harsh result of such a system of taxation is that the man in struggling poverty with a wife and several children will pay in taxes nearly as much for each human life in his humble home as the great captain of industry in his opulence and luxury.

This House knows and the country knows that there will not be forever the maintenance of such an unjust system of taxation. It was created out of the long-ago-established program to plunder the pockets of the American people for the benefit of the special beneficiaries of the high protective tariff, who have maintained in power the Republican Party, and it will surely be supplanted by an equitable system of taxation at the hands of a Democracy which is responsive to the true needs of the American people and which yields obedience to that quickened public sentiment which demands that there shall be equality of opportunity for all and a just distribution of the burdens as well as the blessings of government.

Let us look at the fairness of the proposed tax from another viewpoint. It is proposed at the same time that the Democratic Party has passed in this House a bill to place sugar on the free list and thereby reduce the customs revenues about $53,000,000. That bill was passed as a response to a strong and persistent popular demand. It has been estimated by Chairman UNDERWOOD that the sugar tariff, in taxes and in tribute to the Sugar Trust, places a burden of $115,000,000 annually on the consumers of the land. Such an effect of the sugar tariff has been admitted even by the Republican leaders. When the McKinley bill was reported to the House in 1890, the report, signed by the martyred McKinley, by the late Thomas B. Reed, and by Representatives PAYNE and DALZELL, high priests of protection still with us, after going into details about the bad effect of a sugar tariff, said:

It is clear that the duty on sugar and molasses made the increased cost of sugar and molasses consumed by the people of this country about $1 for each man, woman, and child in the United States.

That burden to-day is the same, and if the free-sugar bill becomes a law it will be lifted from the consumers of the country. Now, the present corporation tax is producing $29,000,000 of revenue, and the proposed excise tax will produce anywhere from $30,000,000 to $60,000,000 more. The revenue of this system of taxation, therefore, can more than make up the loss from free sugar.

With proper economy of governmental administration, the present corporation-tax revenue may all go to replace in part the loss of sugar revenue, and it is easy to see that the whole excise-tax system will completely replace that loss and thus simply will result in lifting an unequal tax from the plain people of the land and putting it, in proportion to business income, with absolute equality upon the bountiful earnings of the wealth of the country. Where stands a man to say that a taxing program to produce such results is unfair?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, but it is said this bill can not become law. Who says so? What marvelous prescience has indicated to the aggregated wealth of this country that it can make a last stand in the Congress of the United States against an enlightened and awakened public opinion? I say, sir, no one will dare thus to assert, unless he be of the class that Byron speaks of—so debased that he "perverts the prophets and purloins the Psalms."

My confidence in this House and in the Senate of the United States is not yet shaken. When an opportunity is afforded to tax the widely diffused wealth of this country by a plan so fair and a method so effective that it attains almost to the universality of an income tax, I believe that the patriotism of the American Congress will assert itself—

For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win.
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

One thing is certain. The militant and soundly progressive Democratic Party takes its united stand on the side of the people; it is making a determined effort to reduce those taxes which harrow the humble homes of the land and to place a proper share of the burdens upon those who have enjoyed the favors of government and are prospering to opulence. Woe be unto him of the Republican organization in this House who elects longer to serve the masters of privilege and stand to-day against this program of justice in taxation for the whole people of this land of the free and home of the brave.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that equality in taxation represents abstract justice. Unless some method is devised by which great wealth can bear its proportionate share of the taxes of the country there can be no equality in taxation, and no justice rendered to those who must bear the burdens of Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Bastable, a leading English financier said:

"Production and a tolerable approach to just distribution are the two essentials of taxation."

The tax proposed by H. R. 21214 is the embodiment of the two essentials named. The revenues from such a tax readily respond to changes in rates without entailing hardship, and at the same time promptly meet the exigencies of Government finances, making good a deficit or diminishing a surplus, as the case may be. If the income of a taxpayer declines, his taxes are reduced in proportion; if, on the other hand, his income increases, his taxes proportionately increase and properly so.

Such a tax possesses wonderful adaptability, flexibility, and certain productiveness, which enables it to meet every peace or war emergency. In England an income tax proved to be a wonderful force, in the language of Gladstone, "an engine of gigantic power." During the great stress of national emergencies it is admittedly without a rival as a relief measure. Many Governments in time of war have invoked its prompt and certain aid. "It enabled England to conquer Napoleon. It came to the relief of our depleted Treasury during the Civil War when the customs revenues were at a low ebb, and saved the rapidly sinking credit of the Nation." We can not expect always to be at peace. If our Nation were plunged into a war with any great commercial country from which we now import large quantities of supplies, our customs revenues would decline and we would be helpless to meet the revenue requirements of the war without taxing the wealth of the country in effect as provided by the bill now under consideration.

The tax as levied in this bill does not purport to be an income tax, but it is an effort to approach as near to the principle of an income tax as it is possible for Congress to do without violating the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. So far as my own judgment is concerned, I have never approved the decision in the Pollock case, in which a divided Supreme Court declared the law of 1894 unconstitutional. I believe whenever this proposition again confronts that court it will, in so many words, reverse its decision in the Pollock case and return to the line of decisions maintained by it for a hundred years, and hold that this Congress has the power to levy directly an income tax.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I agree thoroughly with reference to what the gentleman has said in respect to the decision in the Pollock case, but I want to say that if Congress does not pass an income-tax law, and if this is not an income-tax law, when will the Supreme Court get an opportunity to pass upon the question? If this is not an income-tax law, and the act of 1894 having been repealed by the act of 1897 and the act of 1909, how are we to get the question before the court?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that at this time Congress can not afford to draft this bill in the form of an income tax, because while requiring the revenue that will be produced by it, we must bring it within the terms of the decision of the Supreme Court. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that if it was not for the fact that a constitutional amendment has been submitted to, and may be approved by, the several States within the next year or two, I would be in favor of passing a bill levying directly an income tax for the purpose of sending the question back to the Supreme Court and having it again tested, because I believe we have no right to rest content with the present decision. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree with you thoroughly about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The hour may come at any time when all the taxing power of this Government may be needed to sustain our Army and our fleet in a foreign war, and if the people in the States do not shortly ratify the proposed amendment to the Constitution I think it would be advisable for Congress to enact a direct income-tax law such as was enacted at the time of the Civil War and again in 1894, and send it to the Supreme Court to have the question tested. But I admit that this case does not raise the question. It was not intended that the question should be raised, and I do not for a moment doubt that the Supreme Court will hold that this case in no way conflicts with the decision in the Pollock case, and will affirm the constitutionality of this act. I do not intend to make an argument reciting numerous decisions in favor of the constitutionality of the bill now before the House. My colleagues have already ably, fully, and carefully discussed that question. But I merely wish to say this much as to the constitutionality of this measure.

The power to levy an excise tax was given to this Government by the States when they adopted the Federal Constitution.

The Supreme Court of the United States in its most recent decision on this question, in the case of Flint v. The Stone Tracy Co., stated:

> The Constitution contains only two limitations on the right of Congress to levy excise taxes; they must be levied for the public welfare and are required to be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there for information? Suppose that a man was engaged in the business of being a Member of Congress and would be subject to taxation on $2,500 of salary, which would be the excess over the $5,000 exempt; would the fact that because he came under the terms of the law and was obliged, therefore, to make a report of his income compel him to include in the report of his income revenues received as dividends on stocks or bonds in corporations which paid the corporation tax under the provisions of the Payne law? And if he was obliged to do that, would he not be placed in a different category from the man who was simply the holder and investor of idle wealth in similar corporations from which he received his income, and would not be obliged to make a return, and consequently not pay the tax, such as in the case of Andrew Carnegie? If the Congressman was obliged to pay on his idle invested wealth because he happened to be in the business of being a Member of Congress and the other man was exempted from the payment of his income invested in idle wealth because he was not in any business, would that be uniform taxation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see from the trend of my friend's remarks that he desires to exempt Mr. Carnegie from paying this tax. The purpose of this bill is to reach men like Mr. Carnegie, who to-day own an immense number of bonds and are not paying taxes on them.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I suggest right there in reference to uniformity——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my friend will allow me, I wish to make the suggestion myself. The uniformity of taxation contemplated by this decision of the Supreme Court and all other decisions on this subject has been uniformly held to be geographical uniformity and nothing else; and, therefore, if we levy an excise tax for the public welfare that has geographical uniformity throughout the United States it is within the Constitution, as defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in this same Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. case. The court says:

> When the Constitution was framed the right to lay excise taxes was broadly conferred upon the Congress. At that time very few corporations existed. If the mere fact of State incorporation, extending now to nearly all branches of trade and industry, could withdraw the legitimate objects of Federal taxation from the exercise of the power conferred, the result would be to exclude the National Government from many objects upon which indirect taxes could be constitutionally imposed. Let it be supposed that a group of individuals, as partners, were carrying on a business upon which Congress concluded to lay an excise tax. If it be true that the forming of a State corporation would defeat this purpose, by taking the necessary steps required by the State law to create a corporation and carrying on the business under rights granted by State statute, the Federal tax become invalid, and that source of national revenue would be destroyed except, as to the business in the hands of individuals or partnerships.

Now, I call your attention to that decision, because some gentlemen on that side of the House have argued that levying an excise tax on business only applies to business done by corporations and not that done by individuals. In the Stone Tracy case the only argument that the court makes in reference to corporations is to show that a corporation, by reason of being a corporation, is not excluded from the power of the Government to levy an excise tax on corporations as well as on individuals or copartnerships. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asked me whether he, as a Member of Congress, doing business as a Member of Congress and subject to an excise tax on account of his doing business, has an income in excess of his congressional salary or the $5,000 exempted by the bill, and his congressional salary itself puts him beyond that exemption, whether or not he would be taxed on the additional income.

The court very clearly held in this case and in other cases——

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think the gentleman stated my question correctly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to it. I will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. You did not make a correct statement of what I said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman wants to know whether there is an additional tax on an income derived outside of the actual income from the business he is taxed for doing, as I understand it.

Now, the courts in the Stone Tracy case and in other cases have held that you have a right to levy an excise tax on the privilege of doing business. In the Spreckels case they held that, either as an individual or corporation, you might be taxed for the privilege of doing business as a refiner of sugar or petroleum. Now, if the law enacted at the time of the Spanish-American War that levied the excise on sugar and petroleum refining had named a thousand other businesses that should pay that excise tax, the court would have held that those other businesses were just as much subject to the excise tax as those named in the law. That being the case, there is no reason, to my mind, and I have never heard of a decision of the Supreme Court in which it has been held, that when you can in so many words enumerate the class of business that shall be taxed you can not by general definition enumerate all classes of business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield to a question on this point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois first.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to get the views of the gentleman. I want to ask him this question and put the proposition in the simplest possible form, so that I can see if I understand his position. On the same day that the Flint case was decided the Zonne case was also decided, in which, as the gentleman knows, it was held that a corporation which merely received the rent from real estate and distributed it among its stockholders was exempt. Now let me put this question to the gentleman: Suppose the gentleman himself had owned stock, owned a controlling interest, in the corporation which came under the Zonne case. Suppose he received, in addition to his congressional salary of $7,500, the whole amount paid in rent to the corporation, which, as I remember, was $61,000, could he be compelled to list that income in determining the amount of his income that was taxable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my friend will allow me, that is the question the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asked me, and I hope to get to the answer in a few minutes, but I desire to work up to it in my own way.

Now, I contend that this Congress, having the power to definitely specify by name the businesses which should pay an excise tax, also has a right to say in general terms that all classes of business shall pay an excise tax for the privilege of doing business, and that is exactly what was done in the Payne-Aldrich law when it levied a special excise tax on corporations. It did not say "corporations refining petroleum," or "corporations refining sugar," or "corporations manufacturing pig iron," but it said that all corporations doing business should pay a special excise tax.

In the Spreckels case no distinction was drawn between individuals and corporations where a particular business was named. In the corporation-tax case all business was named, and I contend that the court can not escape the logic of the reasoning that you can levy an excise tax, if it is an excise tax, upon individuals and upon copartnerships by defining the tax as resting on those doing any business instead of a particular business.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, will the gentleman allow me right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be glad to yield later, if the gentleman will allow me to proceed now.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether the leaving out of the income upon municipal bonds was purposely done because you did not want to tax the income or because you did not want to affect the right?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer my friend's question when I come to it. It does not come within this present answer.

Mr. MANN. It is part of the same question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, assuming that Congress has the power, as provided in this bill, to levy an excise tax upon all individuals and copartnerships doing business, then the question arises as to how you shall measure that tax. When you have admitted the right to levy the excise tax, then you must determine in some way what shall be the measure of the tax. And on that point we come directly to the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. In the carriage case cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON] in the debate this morning a tax of $10 on each carriage was levied. I take it to be without question that if we levy an excise tax on the right to do business we can measure that tax by levying $1 a head on every man that is employed in the business or $100 a head on every man that is engaged in the business.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask my friend not to interrupt me until I have answered the question of the gentleman from Illinois. If you have the right to levy a tax and measure its amount by the number of men in business, you unquestionably have the right to measure it by the scope of the business, and in the corporation-tax case its validity did not stand on the question of the measure of the tax. The Supreme Court said when Congress provided that the tax should be equal to 1 per cent on the net income of these corporations doing business that it was merely measuring the amount of the tax, and that tax could apply to the income derived directly from the business as well as all other incomes which the corporation enjoys, whether derived from that particular business or from other sources. That is manifestly so, because there is scarcely a corporation existing to-day that is not deriving income from other sources than the business for which it is organized and in which it is doing business. They are required to make a return of their total income, and they are taxed on their total net income.

Now, if that is true as to the measure of the tax on corporations, why is it not just as constitutional to measure your tax for individuals on the same basis you use for the measure of the tax for corporations? It does not relate to the question of your right to levy an excise tax. It is merely a question of how you shall measure the tax.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman will withhold until I have finished. I am answering his first question.

Mr. MADDEN. It is just an interpretation of the first question. So far you have talked about the man who is doing business. Now, will you be kind enough to tell us about the man who is not doing business, whose income is derived from the same source as that you are talking about?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. The question is, What are you going to do with the man who has retired from business? That is the case with thousands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I prefer to answer the original question first.

Now, my friend wants to know, if a man is engaged in the business of being a Congressman and is taxed under this law for engaging in the business of being a Congressman, whether his income outside of that business is to be taxed? Why, certainly it is. There is a very great distinction between an income tax, the purpose of which is to levy a tax on the amount of income that you have, and an excise tax that is intended to tax your right to do business. But the court has held that after you constitutionally levy an excise tax you can measure the amount the tax shall be by the net income of the person or in some other way. Therefore, if the gentleman is engaged in business as a Congressman, and yet possesses wealth that otherwise would not be taxed under this law if he was not engaged in business, the measure of this tax includes that wealth, and the scope of his tax is measured by the amount of his net income above $5,000. For instance, if the gentleman has a net income of $25,000 a year the amount of his tax under this bill will be $200. He may have all except his congressional salary invested in bonds or annuities, but he is doing business as a Congressman; therefore he is taxed $200 a year for doing that business. Now, I know the gentleman has employed much labor in his business in times past, if not at present. Assuming that he is not a Congressman and is employing 200 men as a contractor, making $25,000 a year, the Congress could levy a tax on him for doing business as a contractor and assess the amount of the tax that he should pay at $1 a head for each man he employed, and his tax on his $25,000 a year income would be $200.

There should be no confusion between the proposition to levy an excise tax for the privilege of doing business and the measure of the tax. We have attempted in this bill, as you did in the corporation-tax law, to make the measure of the tax take the place of an income tax that we could not write. You attempted to do it in referenee to corporations when you enacted the Payne-Aldrich law. We are attempting to do it now in the enactment of this law. As to how far it can reach, I admit that if a man is doing no business at all he is not taxed by this bill. If he is absolutely the idle holder of idle wealth he goes free under this bill. I regret that he does. I would prefer a straight income tax, and I would much prefer levying the tax on idle wealth rather than on industrial wealth, and I hope the day is not far distant when, either through an amendment to the Constitution adopted by the States, or through a change of the Pollock decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, this Congress will again have the absolute power to levy an unqualified income tax. [Applause.] But in order to avoid the prohibition of the Pollock decision and not raise that question of constitutionality, we have written a bill that admittedly does not tax the idle holders of idle wealth. But I do not think there are many men who will escape the tax levied in this bill. The holders of great wealth in this country are not idle men. Almost all of them are engaged in some business. Some gentleman on the other side on Saturday referred to the fact that Mr. William Waldorf Astor was supposed to own $100,000,000 in real estate in the city of New York, and said that he was the idle holder of idle wealth. Now, let me put a case to you. I live here in the Arlington Hotel. I do not know who owns that hotel, but I know it contains about 300 rooms. The owner of that hotel is running a hotel business. He rents the rooms to myself and his other guests. We pay him a monthly rental for those rooms. Would anybody say that he is not in business? Can anybody question the fact that he is doing a hotel business by renting the rooms?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose the owner of a hotel leases the hotel to a manager, who rents the rooms to the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait till I finish. What is the difference between the hotel man and Mr. Astor? Mr. Astor may own 300 houses in the city of New York instead of the 300 rooms in the Arlington Hotel. What does he do? He rents those houses to anybody who wants to rent them. He keeps those houses in repair. He is in the business of furnishing homes and storehouses to people. Can anybody deny the fact that he is in business?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman has cited a pretty good parallel, because, as I understand it, Mr. Astor owns the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, where I have had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman; but Mr. Boldt manages the hotel. He is in the business of running that hotel. Mr. Astor simply receives, perhaps, a dividend under the lease. Is there not a distinction between these two so far as the business of running a hotel is concerned?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad my friend made the suggestion. Referring to the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, will the gentleman tell me that there is any difference between these two propositions: If I go to the hotel and say to Mr. Boldt, the proprietor of that hotel, "I want you to rent me one room," and he does so, the gentleman says he is in the hotel business. If I go to Mr. Boldt and say, "Mr. Boldt, I am a multimillionaire. I am going to bring my friends to New York and I want you to rent me every room in your hotel," is he not still in the hotel business? Now, when Mr. Astor goes to Mr. Boldt and says, "I do not want to retail out these rooms, but I want to rent them in wholesale quantities, and I will rent you every room in my house," what is the difference between his renting to Mr. Boldt every room in his house and Mr. Boldt renting to somebody else every room in his house? [Applause on the Democratic side.] It seems to me that is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think Mr. Astor is in the hotel business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I certainly think he is in the business of renting real estate.

Mr. MANN. An agent will do that for him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not every man transact his business through agents? The bigger the business the more agents he has. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The agent has to pay an excise tax for the privilege of doing business, but the man whose business is done through the agent is not engaged in business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose, then, the gentleman from Illinois will say that if I own a railroad, or am running a railroad, and hire a conductor, that the conductor is to pay the tax for running the railroad.

Mr. MANN. The hiring of a conductor is a part of the business of running a railroad.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman who owns the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel is in the business of renting the hotel and other property.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Alabama claim that a widow who owns a house and permits an agent to rent it for her is in business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If she has more than $5,000 a year income she is in the business of renting real estate. I own a lot or a block of ground and I conclude to have a truck garden on it and use my real estate for that purpose. I am in the business of a truck gardener.

The gentleman from Illinois owns lots across the street. I have to pay the necessary tax for raising vegetables. The gentleman across the street instead of raising vegetables on his lots erects buildings and rents them. Does the gentleman mean to say, because I am raising vegetables on one block and he is renting houses on the other, that I am in business and he is not in business?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman states a case where both parties are in business. Suppose he owned the block and gave through his agent a long-time lease on it, does the gentleman claim that he is in business? I may die and my son may collect the rent. Is my son in business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you rented the block for a month, you might die and your son collect the balance of the lease; that has nothing to do with it. It makes no difference whether you lease it for a month, a day, or a year, or 10 years; if you are engaged in the business of renting real estate you have money invested in it, and you are just as much in business, in my judgment, as if you were engaged in manufacturing pig iron.

Mr. MANN. If you are engaged in the business of renting real estate, that goes without saying.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What makes you engage in the business of renting real estate?

Mr. MANN. I am not engaged in the business of renting real estate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman admits that if he had a number of houses and was renting them by the month and went around collecting the rents he would be engaged in the business of renting real estate. I can see no distinction between that and the situation where he owns a number of houses and rents them for the year and has an agent go around and collect the rents.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can see this distinction, that in the one case there would be only one tax paid for the business, and in the other there would be two. This is a question of business, and the excise tax is on the business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The business is renting real estate.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me get through with this first; I can not answer so many questions at one time. The gentleman wants to know whether a man like Mr. Carnegie, who is supposed to have many millions invested in bonds, is in business. Well, really, Mr. Carnegie is in many different kinds of business. He is in business entirely outside of his ownership of bonds. But if he is in any business whatever, then his excise tax is measured by his net income from all sources.

And I want to say this: If a man in Chicago is engaged in loaning money on watches, he is said to be in the business of a pawnbroker. Now, if a gentleman living in New York is lending his money out to great corporations, and instead of making a 30-day loan makes a 30-year loan, it seems to me that he is just as much in the business of lending his money as the man who loans his from the pawnshop. They are both engaged in the business of loaning money and make their income out of these loans. I think that is very clearly defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Flint v. the Stone Tracy Co., where the court says:

> It remains to consider whether these corporations are engaged in business. "Business" is a very comprehensive term and embraces everything about which a person can be employed. That which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of a livelihood or profit.

If a man takes his money, and his time and attention are engaged directly or through an agent in building houses and renting them, is not that within this definition—

> That which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of livelihood or profit.

If he has $100,000,000, and instead of investing it in real estate lends it on long or short time bonds or securities, does that not come within the definition that the Supreme Court lays down—that which occupies his time and attention for the purpose of a livelihood or profit? It seems to me it clearly does.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this case is within the rule, as he understands it: A farmer retires from his farm, rents it, and goes to town. If his income is more than $5,000 a year from that farm, is he engaged, within the meaning of the law, in such a business as to make him subject to the terms of this act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I have no doubt there are cases not within the terms of this law. We do not contend that it embraces every man, because, as I have already said, the idle holder of idle wealth will not be taxed under this bill; but I do contend that you will find in the end that there are very few idle holders of idle wealth; and I think that if a man were in the business of renting farms or invested his money in country real estate and rented it out for a livelihood, he would come within the terms of doing business as well as would the man who built houses in the city and rented them for a livelihood.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take too much of the time of the committee, but before closing I wish to refer to the amount of revenue this bill is likely to produce. We must compare it with bills that have produced revenue in a similar way, and although this is not an income tax, it seeks to levy or fix the amount of the excise tax on the net incomes of individuals; and therefore we can fairly compare it with the tax collected under the income tax at the time of the Civil War and other similar income taxes.

The first tax on incomes was authorized August 5, 1861, at a rate of 3 per cent on the excess of all incomes above $800 per annum. This was increased in 1862, and again in 1865, until incomes between $600 and $5,000 were taxed at 5 per cent, and above $5,000, 10 per cent. As the immediate war necessities became less pressing the limit of exemption was advanced to $1,000, and in 1867 to $2,000; in 1872 the tax was abolished. The number of persons assessed, with the total amounts received from this form of duty from 1866 to 1870, was as follows:

Year.	Number of persons.	Amount collected.
1868	254,617	41,455,000

These figures clearly show that the tax as a whole was very productive, amounting during the five years shown in this table to $253,017,000.

It is true that at that time the taxes were levied on corporations as well as individuals, and this bill seeks only to levy a tax on individuals and copartnerships, a tax already being levied upon corporations. But considering the few corporations that existed in the sixties, as compared with the number of corporations that exist to-day; considering that aside from the States bordering the Mississippi there was almost a wilderness on to the Pacific slope, a vast stretch of country that is now filled with prosperous people and thriving cities; considering, for instance, the fact that the city of New York to-day has ten times the population it had at the time of the Civil War; considering all this, when we estimate that the present bill levying a tax against individuals and copartnerships doing business will bring $60,000,000, contrasted with the Civil War tax on a much smaller population and a much smaller amount of wealth, it is not an exaggeration to say that the law will produce that much, or more than was produced during any year of the five years of the Civil War.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman admits that in order to raise $60,000,000 a year under this bill there would have to be available incomes amounting to $6,000,000,000 a year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that $6,000,000,000 a year is 4 per cent on a total wealth of $150,000,000,000 a year. The gentleman admits that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to the figures, and I will give my friend my own figures on the subject.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has made the statement that conservatively estimated this tax of 1 per cent will produce $60,000,000 a year. I asked him a direct question whether that does not presuppose that there is wealth in this country amounting to $150,000,000,000 which is susceptible to this tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to my friend that if he will let me go ahead I shall give him my own argument in this case. You collect to-day $30,000,000 under your corporation tax. The amount of corporate wealth as measured by the capital stock of corporations making returns to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in 1911 is about $58,000,000,000. Many of these corporations are exempt under the present law. You collect thirty millions of revenue from them to-day and you entirely overlook the fact that you do not collect any revenue from the bonds of these corporations.

You entirely overlook the fact that this bill taxes the earnings from the bonds of corporations and makes the owners of stock in holding companies pay a tax in addition to that under the corporation-tax bill. The amount of income from the bonded wealth in this country amounts to $1,200,000,000.

Mr. MANN. What were the gentleman's figures?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the memorandum before me, but I will correct it if I am not correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is very much underestimating the bonded wealth at $1,200,000,000. It is over $30,000,000,000. It all appears in the report of the minority on page 4. The gentleman does not dispute the accuracy of the figures of the minority report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I find by reference to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the amount of bonded wealth, as measured by the bonded indebtedness of the corporations making returns in 1911 under the corporation-tax law, is $30,715,336,008. At only 4 per cent interest this bonded wealth would earn more than $1,200,000,000.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, when he said $1,200,000,000, must have meant interest.

Mr. LONGWORTH. These are the figures furnished by the Treasury Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The tax levied by this bill on this bonded indebtedness will far exceed $12,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman must realize that a vast amount of these bonds have been held by corporations which are included in estimating the total income earned by those corporations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not a vast amount of them.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman will know more about it when it becomes a law as regards taxing insurance companies. What I rose for, however, was another question. He states that under the law of 1867, or whatever the date was, the percentage of taxation was 5 per cent on incomes below $5,000 and 10 per cent on those above. Now, of course, under this law the income tax is only 1 per cent. Has the gentleman made any computation to show how much less it would have produced under the other law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman can make the calculation.

Mr. PAYNE. And also how much would be deducted on account of the smaller limit of income that was taxed under the old law? Here $5,000 is the limit; under that all under $5,000 was taxed at 5 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the gentleman's question. In 1866 there were 460,000 people assessed. The total amount collected was $73,000,000.

Mr. PAYNE. How much were the exemptions?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Six hundred dollars.

Mr. PAYNE. Instead of $5,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Instead of $5,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the corporation was out of the list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, as I stated to the gentleman, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] admits, that we go into the domain of corporations and tax them $5,000,000 a year. It is reasonable to estimate that this law will produce from the bonds of the United States $12,000,000 a year, and that the additional tax of the holding companies will amount in the neighborhood of $8,000,000, so that out of the corporate wealth that you are already taxing we will obtain $20,000,000 of additional revenue from corporate wealth. This bill can raise $50,000,000, and only have $30,000,000 to raise out of the entire wealth that is owned by individuals and copartnerships.

I will approach the estimate from this viewpoint. The total wealth of this country, according to the census of 1909, was estimated at more than $135,000,000,000. At the rate of increase between 1900 and 1905, as shown by the statistics of the Bureau of the Census, the wealth of the United States during the first 12-month period under H. R. 21214 will be not less than $150,000,000,000. The total corporate wealth as measured by the capital stock of all the corporations making returns to the Treasury Department under the corporation-tax law amounted, in 1911, to $57,886,430,519. From a careful examination of the classes of industries represented by these corporations it would appear conservative to estimate that at least $12,000,000,000 of this capital stock represents inflation above the actual wealth invested in the industries, thus leaving $46,000,000,000 to represent the actual corporate wealth in 1911. Estimating the same annual increase between 1911 and 1913, as was shown between 1910 and 1911 in the returns of corporate capital under the corporation-tax law, the amount of the actual corporate wealth of the country in 1913 would be estimated at about $55,000,000,000. If, from the total wealth of $150,000,000,000 for 1913 there be deducted the fifty-five billions of corporate wealth, the result, ninety-five billions, would represent the noncorporate wealth. From the corporations in 1911 there were collected $29,432,255, and at the same ratio of increase as that given for the capital invested, the amount of revenue to be collected in 1913 would be estimated at $35,200,000. Now, if it may be assumed that an individual is as likely to have a net income in excess of $5,000 as a corporation, it would be seen that as fifty-five billions of corporate wealth produced $35,200,000 of revenue, the ninety-five billions of noncorporate wealth would produce revenue to the extent of $60,800,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman ever consider that when he gets to taxing mutual insurance companies what mighty hot water he will be getting into?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say to the gentleman that he has not read this bill, and I am surprised that he has not, because I know of no one of my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee that are ordinarily more diligent in their duties and in the understanding of the measures that come before that committee than the distinguished gentleman from New York. But he knows, if he has read the bill, that we are not attemping to tax mutual insurance companies. We tax the income——

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, well, that is playing upon words. It is hardly worthy of the gentleman. It is nothing but an income tax, pure and simple. There is nothing less of it by calling it an excise tax and measuring it by the income.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Supreme Court of the United States differs very widely from the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. Not any more widely than with the gentleman from Alabama on the subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman answer one question, please?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated a moment ago that outside of the corporate wealth there were $95,000,000,000 of wealth in the United States. Can the gentleman state, for the information of the committee, how much of the $95,000,000,000 is in the exempt class?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not state it accurately, but it is comparatively small.

Mr. MADDEN. Approximately?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the gentleman understands, when I say that there is ninety-five billions of wealth, he understands that most of that is taken from assessed value. I do not know what the assessed value in his section is——

Mr. MADDEN. The assessed value is only one-third of the actual value.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In my country the assessed value is usually one-half. Now, the assessed values are about one-half or one-third of the actual values.

The figures for wealth are largely taken from the assessor's books and estimated by the Bureau of the Census from book figures. But as the gentleman knows, and as I know, those assessed values are very much less than the actual values.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And therefore the amount of tax will far exceed the assessed value, because this bill will levy a tax on the actual value.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman spoke of the assessed value in our State. But the one hundred and thirty-five billions of wealth a year or two ago was not based upon the assessed valuation in our State. It was based on the actual valuation, which is three times as much as the assessed valuation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I mean to say is that these values are largely taken from the assessors' books, and the estimate is made in that way.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. They may be based upon the assessors' books, but they are estimated by the actual values.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They may be in some places and in other places not. But I have no doubt, nor do I think anyone has, that this estimate of values in the United States is largely under the actual values.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WARBURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the committee has any data as to the number of men who are drawing salaries of over $5,000 a year? Would not that be a very large number?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would be a very large number, but I have not the information, and therefore I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It has not been made quite clear as to whether or not you propose to reach the enormously rich individuals——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend——

Mr. FOCHT. Let me ask the question further.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you will allow me, I will say that I would be glad to yield my time, but when the gentleman was not in here I discussed that question for three-quarters of an hour. I will therefore ask my friend to read the RECORD in the morning and not take up my time now.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman is sure about that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just explained that, and I do not wish to go into the explanation again. But I think it does reach that class of wealth.

Mr. FOCHT. In this bill you tax industry and enterprise. Now, does it reach Mr. Carnegie's three hundred millions, and Mr. Morgan's five hundred millions, and Mr. Rockefeller's eight hundred millions? Do you think you can reach that enormous personal rebated wealth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so.

I have submitted my estimate of the amount of revenue to be collected under this tax, giving the details more fully than I have explained on the floor of the House. I merely wish to say that I have the utmost confidence that if this bill becomes a law it will produce as revenue for the United States Government between fifty and sixty million dollars, at a low estimate.

Now, in conclusion, I merely want to say——

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman from Alabama yields the floor I would like to ask him a question about the bill. I do not know whether the gentleman can dispose of it, because I understand the gentleman himself did not draw the bill. With reference to this provision for the deduction by paymasters and officers of the Government, and employers anywhere, that the paymaster shall deduct the aforesaid tax of 1 per cent, I do not find anything in the bill which provides for a reduction pro rata of the amount, or any method of determining that. Is that the intention; and if so, how do you arrive at the limitation of $5,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that the purpose of the bill is this——

Mr. MANN. I understand the purpose of it. I quite appreciate that. I was discussing the question, so that if there is an explanation it could be given for the guidance of administrative authority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will permit, I will try to give an explanation. The purpose of this bill is, if possible, to adopt the English system and collect the tax at the source, and where it is so collected it can not be collected again.

In this connection I will quote Prof. Seligman from his book entitled "The Income Tax":

"The principle of the stoppage at source in the income tax was introduced in England. As compared with the old method of the direct, lump-sum assessment of incomes, the effects of the stoppage-at-source method were immediately noticeable. Although the rate of the new tax was only one-half of the old one, the yield was almost the same. In other words, the alteration in the principle of assessment at one blow doubled the efficiency of the tax. No more signal proof could be afforded of the vital importance of good administrative methods in fiscal practice. * * * In the United States the arguments in favor of this method are far stronger than in Europe, because of the peculiar conditions of American life. In the first place, nowhere is corporate activity so developed and in no country of the world does the ordinary business of the community assume to so overwhelming an extent the corporate form. Not only is a large part of the intangible wealth of individuals composed of corporate securities, but a very appreciable part of business profits consists of corporate profits. In the second place, in no other important country are investments to so great an extent domestic in character. The one great difficulty in England * * * is that connected with foreign securities. And in France, where the same difficulty exists, * * * the projected control of these foreign investments through the French bankers and agents forms the one difficult and complicated point in the scheme. In the United States, on the other hand, the situation is the reverse. Instead of our capitalists seeking investments abroad, it is the foreign capitalists who purchase American securities. We are therefore fortunately exempt from the chief embarrassment which confronts Europe, and there is every likelihood that this situation will not be changed for some time to come. The arguments that speak in favor of a stoppage-at-source income tax abroad hence apply with redoubled force here. The stoppage-at-source scheme lessens to an enormous extent the strain on the administration; it works, so far as it is applicable, almost automatically; and where enforced it secures to the last penny the income that is rightfully due."

But inasmuch as all of the tax could not be collected at the source, there is an additional provision in the bill to the effect that the man who is taxed must make a return. Now, there is no intent in this bill to collect the tax twice. If in his return the man shows that he is receiving a salary from a corporation subject to a tax which has been deducted from the salary and paid by the corporation, he will be given credit under the terms of this bill for the amount that has been paid for him, and he will have to pay only the excess above that which has already been collected from him at the source.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, he is not answering the question that I asked at all. I understand that part of the bill. A Member of Congress receives $7,500 a year. You know that a part of that might be taxed, and you might deduct one-twelfth part of 1 per cent per month, although that is not what the bill says. That would be the English system. But supposing a Member of Congress received $4,000 a year. How much would be deducted the first month?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There would not be any deducted. It would then be apparent that the income was not subject to taxation. Therefore the disbursing officer of the Congress would not pay any tax for him, but that Member of Congress who received only $4,000 a year would have to put that $4,000 in with the balance of his income when he made his return, and it would be estimated by the collector of internal revenue when he made up his tax.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate that the English system provides for the deduction of a pro rata amount. This provides for a deduction of 1 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention to deduct a pro rata amount of 1 per cent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may be very dull, but I must say I do not understand the gentleman's question. Does the gentleman mean, Shall it be done by the month or by the year?

Mr. MANN. Is it one-twelfth every month, when you are paid a monthly salary or one twenty-fourth every two weeks, when you are paid a semimonthly salary?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under this bill, as I understand it, it would be the duty of the Sergeant at Arms to retain that portion of the tax, where he paid a salary that was subject to the tax, and he would determine how he should retain it. He would have to make the return only once a year. He might find it necessary to retain a portion each month. He might find it necessary, in order to protect himself, to collect it all at the end of the year; but the burden will rest on him to see that the tax is paid, and he would exercise his own discretion in determining at what time he should deduct the amount of the tax.

Mr. MANN. The bill says, if the gentleman will notice about the retention—

Computed on the basis herein prescribed—

Which is a basis of computing 1 per cent on all over $5,000 income.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That is what a corporation is required to do, to retain 1 per cent.

Computed on the basis herein prescribed.

If anybody can explain what that means, there ought to be an explanation put in the RECORD, as a matter of some advice at least to the administrative officers, because, without it, there will be inextricable confusion, if this bill becomes a law, on the part of employers or corporations paying salaries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Illinois that under the corporation tax, the administrative features of which were not considered as fully as those of this bill, there would have been inextricable trouble in collecting that tax if the Secretary of the Treasury had not been authorized to make rules and regulations for its collection. That avoided the difficulties and enabled him to establish a fixed system for the enforcement of this law. This bill also provides that as to the working features of the law the Secretary of the Treasury may make such rules and regulations as he finds necessary, and I think it is safer to allow the Secretary to make such rules and regulations, which may be changed as emergencies may require, than to enact them as a part of the fixed law of the land.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I quite agree with the gentleman in that statement. The trouble is that the bill endeavors specifically to cover those things. He could not make rules and regulations that conflicted with the terms of the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not specifically cover those propositions, and the gentleman said the administrative features were not specific. They only say that 1 per cent shall be collected, as I indicated a minute ago. Now, I will ask my friend to let me conclude my remarks.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry that I trouble the gentleman by asking him questions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is no trouble at all. I simply wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if the gentleman does not like to answer questions——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have endeavored to answer the questions of the gentleman from Illinois, and I think I have done so.

I merely want to say, in conclusion, that, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned, it has always stood for the proposition that the wealth of this country should bear its fair share of the taxes necessary to support this great Government.

I do not believe there has ever been a decision in the United States that has brought more criticism on the courts of this land than the 5 to 4 decision in the income-tax case, especially in view of the unfortunate way in which that decision was rendered. Up to the time of that decision I had never heard the highest tribunal of the United States criticized. It was recognized by all men as the final arbiter of justice. As long as this Government retained the power to tax wealth, and exercised that power, we did not hear the continual socialistic cry against the rich. But when the Supreme Court of the United States abandoned a line of decisions that had been maintained for a hundred years and notified the people of the United States that the great wealth of this country was exempted from the power of the Government to levy taxes upon it, that marked the beginning of unrest. The time never will come when the toiling masses of the American people will be content to bear the great burdens of taxation to support a Government that properly and justly protects the great property interests of this country, when those great property interests are exempt from taxation and do not have to bear their proportionate share of the burden of the Government. In my judgment there is nothing that this Congress can do that will go further toward the maintenance of a stable government and toward quieting discontent in the land than to return to the principles of our fathers and place a fair share of the burdens of taxation on the great wealth of this Nation. And to-day that proposition confronts every Member of this Congress.

I do not think any man can justly question the constitutionality of this bill. He may indulge in captious criticism as to the extent to which this tax can be levied, but it is an honest effort to tax the great wealth of this country. If it does not go as far as it should go, it will be an incentive for the people of the United States to ratify the proposed amendment to the Constitution. To-day you are presented with an opportunity to say whether you propose to continue levying taxes necessary for the support of this Government on the consuming capacity of the American people, or whether you are willing that a comparatively small portion of the burden of maintaining the Government shall be borne by great wealth, whose possessors, more than anyone else, receive the benefits of government. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY].

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the constitutionality of this bill, not only on account of the fact that it has been very ably disposed of by others, but there are so many other serious objections to its passage on the merits that from my viewpoint its legality or illegality is not very material.

Neither shall I discuss the question as to the amount of money which could be collected from the people under its provisions, although this is important if it is intended to take the place of a law which now concededly produces about $55,000,000 of revenue per annum. For I am opposed to the whole policy and scheme which its adoption in any form would force us to accept. It is simply a general scheme which the Democratic Party has adopted to excuse their murderous assaults upon the great industries of the country, as this has already been done upon one of them so far as any action on the part of this House could make it possible.

I am opposed to a national income tax and to a national tax on corporations in times of peace, for in this legislation one clearly sees a well-defined scheme and purpose on the part of the Democracy to change our entire existing system of raising moneys for the support of the Government and a substitution of it for the present system of a tariff.

It is in relation to this change of our national system of taxation and its effect that I shall endeavor to point out, as it seems to me most important of all. With a legal income and corporation tax which can be increased from year to year to cover any blunder which the Democracy is sure to make there would be no necessity for an income from the tariff on imports, whether it be levied for protection's sake or for a revenue.

The gentleman from Alabama, the present leader of the Democracy in this House, has so plainly stated the position of himself and his party as to leave no doubt as to exactly where they stand in relation to the tariff. He has frequently announced, and reiterated only a day or two ago when he and his party were engaged in the killing off of a great agricultural industry, that neither he nor his party had ever since the beginning stood for a tariff upon any American industry for the purpose of protecting it against the slave labor of the world, but only allowed it to exist as a necessary evil to raise money for the support of the Government. When this necessity no longer exists, then there will be no tariff for protection or otherwise if the Democracy remain in power and have their way.

This is one of the reasons why I am opposed to this legislation, and it presents an all-sufficient reason why it and all kindred legislation should be defeated.

To show that I am correct as to the purposes of the Democracy it is only necessary to state the reasons which they offer for the passage of this bill, which are that having passed a free-trade bill on sugar and thus lost $55,000,000 of assured annual income they proceed to try to recoup this loss by the passage of this bill, and this scheme will continue until the last vestige of a protective tariff is wiped out and the entire burden of supporting the Government is placed upon its business interests in one form or another.

This whole scheme, if entirely successful, would result in the destruction of substantially all our great industries, and at the same time transfer an additional burden upon the business interests of the country which are already bearing the greatest share of the burden of Government, whether national, State, or local. And this fact suggests to me another reason for opposing the passage of this bill.

Let us stop for a moment and inquire as to what method is now employed in conducting the business affairs of the country and who are now paying the greatest proportion of taxes. Most business is now conducted by a corporation duly organized under the laws of some State. This method has been generally adopted not only because it can be better conducted in that way than in any other, but it is also possible to secure a much larger amount of capital for investment so necessary for the economical management and production of articles to be manufactured.

A majority of all the incomes of our people upon invested capital is derived from the ownership of stock and bonds in some one of these thousands of corporations which transact the business of the country. But our Democratic friends denounce them, one and all, as a common scourge. I do not recall that in the five years of my service here that I have ever heard a Democrat say a kind word for an industrial or other corporation or ever performed an official act which had for its intent and purpose the benefiting of the business in which they were engaged. On the other hand, I have heard them denounced almost daily as thieves and robbers and the common enemy of all mankind; and, as the surest way of exterminating them all, they propose not only to take away from them all the protection which under the laws they now enjoy, but, as though that were not enough, tax them completely out of existence.

In their desire to render some excuse for this wholesale and unjust denunciation of our business interests no care even is ever exhibited for the poor and unfortunate employee, who will be obliged to either take the wages paid to his unfortunate brother in other lands or starve. But who cares for the workingman, anyway? Certainly not the Democracy, who have ever stood for cheap labor. And, besides, does not their scheme contemplate affording them an opportunity of purchasing in the markets of the world all that which they were heretofore paid for and produced? What difference is it whether he has the price to purchase his daily bread and the other necessaries of life or not? Has not Democracy agreed to remove every tariff Chinese wall, and that is all that it ever agreed to do? When did Democracy ever agree to keep the laborer employed at present or even living wages? Never. They only agreed that everything he required for his daily comfort would be cheaper, because he would be privileged to purchase from others cheaper than it has heretofore been possible for him to produce them for himself.

Oh, this Democratic free-trade idea is a fine thing! Just think of it for a moment, for under it you can purchase all your goods from foreign lands cheaper; and if any employer in this country tries to lower the wages of his employees because he can no longer get his old prices, and therefore can not afford to pay higher or usual wages, have not the Democracy assured him in advance that the employer is simply an old member of the Ananias club and is robbing him at every opportunity?

And besides, has not the Democracy proposed to so amend existing law that no injunctions can hereafter be granted by the courts against them, and hence they are at liberty not only to strike but to boycott and destroy their employers' property at will, and beat up and destroy him personally to their hearts' content? Is not that enough for a laboring man in addition to the joy of free trade? What does he want anyway—the earth? Why should he be ever heard to suggest that free trade means free labor? Why should he ever inquire how his employer is going to be able to pay him a thousand dollars for producing a given quantity of merchandise when it must be sold in competition with similar articles in the same market which have cost only one-half or one-third as much to produce? Why muddy the Democratic waters by the asking of such irrelevant questions?

It has ever been the policy of the Republican Party to raise its revenues in times of peace by an internal-revenue tax, levied for the most part on luxuries, such as liquors and tobacco, and a tariff upon imported articles, which has not only resulted in producing a sufficiently large revenue for the support of the Government, but has protected the laborer and secured for him more than a living wage. The National Government has never attempted in times of peace to invade a State and take from it its sources of income by levying a tax either upon its business or property. The various States, and the counties, towns, and municipalities therein, have been granted and assured a free field to raise taxes in such manner as they saw fit upon the property within the State. The States have relied upon this as a settled policy of the National Government and have so regulated their taxes that all business and property therein is made to bear its just share of the burdens of government, and this system so long adopted can not be disturbed without great injury and hardship resulting therefrom. Vast responsibilities have been assumed by most of the States, and a change in the methods of raising funds to meet the current expense of the National Government would result in unjustly increasing the burdens of those who under State laws are bearing their just proportion of taxation.

To illustrate, take the State of New York as an example. For several years past and up to last year before the Democracy came into power all the expenses of the State government were met by indirect taxes. Taxes were levied upon real estate and some personal property not otherwise taxed to defray the great expenses of towns, counties, and municipalities. Vast obligations have been assumed by our State as well as by our counties, towns, and municipalities in reliance upon a continuance of this general policy of taxation by the National Government. The State of New York has up to the present time authorized the issue of $127,000,000 of bonds for the improvement of its canals, $50,000,000 of bonds for good roads, and several million dollars more for a forest preserve and other purposes, and it is now seriously contemplating other improvements on a vast scale.

The bonded indebtedness of our cities, counties, and towns is so great as to make our national debt look like 30 cents. For instance, the bonded indebtedness of the city of New York alone is about equal to the national debt with a yearly tax roll of $200,000,000, and other cities in like proportion.

Are not the burdens of our taxpayers quite enough at present without the National Government adding anything thereto? If our business interest can stand any further taxation than it now bears, should it not be left to our State to determine those additional burdens instead of being further robbed and deprived of that by the National Government, whose present sources of supply are ample for all purposes?

Our citizens are now contributing their full share toward the support of the National Government under existing laws. Our State only recently, and in order to preserve to itself the opportunity of levying further taxes by different means if necessity required, has by its present assembly passed by a large majority a resolution repealing its former ill-considered action of a year ago which gave its consent to the National Government to levy an income tax upon our citizens. We need all the revenues which we can legitimately and properly get by any fair system of taxation to discharge our existing obligations and to meet current expenses. We have never appealed to the National Government for aid in the construction of our canals or good roads or in the preservation of our forest preserves. We have taken pride as a State in doing these things ourselves, not only for the benefit of our own citizens, but for the Nation and the world at large, and we wish to continue to do so.

This Democratic scheme, however, would result not only in destroying our tariff policy, and hence our great industrial system, but would at the same time destroy our present just and equitable system of National, State, and local taxation to the serious injury of all concerned.

For these reasons I am opposed to the passage of the present bill, and I have reason to believe that I but speak the sentiment of a vast majority of the citizens, not only of my native State, but all other States of the Union, which are trying to discharge their obligations to their citizens without constantly appealing for aid to the National Government. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the sugar bill just passed and the present excise bill imposing a tax upon net incomes of over $5,000 may well be considered as practically one piece of legislation. The sacrifice of Federal revenues by removing the tariff on sugar is about $53,000,000. This is the amount collected at the customhouse on sugar imported from Cuba and other foreign countries, but the tariff rate raises the price of this important food product to all American consumers, so that in addition to the $53,000,000 which they are paying annually into the United States Treasury, they are paying about $60,000,000 to the producers and refiners of sugar in the United States.

The bill now under discussion is expected to produce a revenue of between fifty and sixty millions of dollars per annum, and if both measures are enacted into law they will shift the burden from sugar consumers, who are largely people of moderate means, and place it upon those who have incomes in excess of $5,000 per year.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY], who has just addressed the House in opposition to these measures, very properly characterizes them as a change in our national system of taxation. This is not the first time that sugar has been placed on the free list nor is it the first time that we have had a tax on incomes, but it is the first time that these enactments have been contemporaneous or with the avowed purpose of giving relief to the consuming masses of our people, and in this respect it marks an important epoch in Federal taxation.

I firmly believe that these measures are based upon a correct principle, and it is my purpose to briefly consider the attitude of the two principal political parties on the important subject of raising revenues for the Federal Government.

In 1904 the Republican national platform for the first time admitted that there was danger of carrying the protective principle too far, and it was deemed advisable, as a party measure, to lay down some rule or standard by which it should be limited. This was out of deference to a well-recognized public sentiment that the rates of the Dingley law were too high. The language used was somewhat noncommittal, but it answered its purpose. It is this: "The measure of protection should always at least equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad." A too-confiding public construed this as a statement that it would be feasible, or at least possible, to ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and that if continued in power the Republican Party would proceed to ascertain such difference and readjust the tariff rates accordingly.

President Roosevelt was reelected and both Houses of Congress were Republican by a safe majority, and yet no steps were taken to ascertain the difference in the cost of production, and the rates of the Dingley law remained unchanged.

In 1908 the murmurs of the previous four years had become a very pronounced uproar of popular discontent. It would not do to go before the public without a more definite promise of relief. Hence, the assertion in the platform of that year of the new principle that the measure of protection ought to be the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, omitting the words "at least" used in the previous platform, but surreptitiously opening the door for rates higher than this rule would permit by adding "together with a reasonable profit for American industries." This remarkable and somewhat startling "reasonable profit" clause then for the first and probably the last time made its appearance in a Republican platform.

The situation in 1908 was so acute that this additional platform announcement was made:

> The Republican Party declares unequivocally for a revision of the tariff by a special session of the Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

During the campaign which followed the Republican candidate for President and other party leaders, without exception, stated that this meant a material downward revision. They admitted the justice of the popular demand, made no claim that the Dingley rates were in harmony with the cost of production rule, and recognized that the exigency for a downward revision was so great that a special session of Congress should be immediately called in order to give the needed and promised relief.

The Republican candidate was elected, a special session was called, and the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was enacted. It is generally conceded that the rates of the Dingley law were not reduced. The most offensive schedule, that taxing wool and woolens remained without material change. The rule which the party had laid down as the proper measure of protection was ignored from the start by the controlling faction of the Republican Party, by the very men who had only a few months before interpreted and praised it, and asked for the votes of the people and a continuance of power in order that the tariff might be reduced by its friends according to the platform principle by which protection was to be measured. This is history.

In order to accurately determine the attitude of the prevailing faction of the Republican Party upon the question of Federal taxation it is necessary right here to dwell for a moment upon the merits of the measure of protection which they have laid down.

The business community never took any stock in the guaranty of profits, but the difference in cost of production plan seemed plausible on its face, and for a time received more approval than a careful analysis of it justifies.

The city of Grand Rapids, where I reside, is recognized as the greatest furniture center in the world. Some of its factories make satisfactory profits and declare large dividends. Others, with the same kind of labor and machinery, make no profits at all. Such differences are found in every industry the world over. One factory buys its raw material when the market is the most favorable and in large quantities. It stores its material and locates all machinery so that not an unnecessary step need to be taken. It is careful in its selection of selling agents and takes vigorous measures to keep them up to their work. It adopts a wise and just policy toward labor, avoiding strikes and other complications. Another factory just across the road, making the same line of goods is conspicuous for its neglect of all these things. They sell their output in the same market at substantially the same price. If there were any uniformity of cost, there would necessarily be some uniformity of profit. The fact that there is in reality such a wide difference in profits clearly indicates a corresponding difference in cost of production. It is the difference between good management and bad management. Which is to be taken as the American standard? The best-managed factory, with its low cost, or the worst-managed factory, with its excessive cost?

But before we reach that point we encounter another difficulty. The badly conducted factory has no accurate method of keeping a cost account, while the best-conducted factory under the shrewdest management would regard its cost of production as a trade secret. I doubt if any Member of this body, or any commission appointed either by this body or by the President, can ascertain the actual cost of production in any single furniture factory in Grand Rapids or the difference of cost between different factories. Manufacturers can not afford to show their hand to their competitors or to the purchasing public, and unless charged with illegal conduct can not be compelled to do so.

The management of a factory through death, resignation, and other causes is necessarily subject to frequent changes. It may be highly efficient now and equally inefficient a year hence. If the difference in the cost of production between any two factories could be accurately ascertained at any given time a year or even a month later the difference might be materially changed or even reversed.

Our tariff laws have put a premium on inefficient management in the protected industries by the removal in whole or in part of competition, which is essential to the highest degree of human effort. The Interstate Commerce Commission refused to permit the railroad companies to raise their rates on the ground that their management was not as efficient as it might be and that with better management fair profits could be earned at existing rates. If this is good medicine for railroad companies why not for steel companies, sugar companies, woolen and cotton companies? Why should inefficient management be a liability in one case and an asset in another? If the cost of production is higher in this country than in some other country it is of the highest importance to know why. Does it come from the payment of higher wages or from using out-of-date machinery or from overtaxed materials such as lumber and steel used in the erection of plants or from overtaxed raw materials used directly in the manufacturing process, or does it come from inefficient management?

It is the evident purpose of the Republican national platform to convey the impression that there is a difference in the cost of production between our own and foreign countries, that this difference is against us, that it can be ascertained with reasonable accuracy, and, furthermore, that it is caused solely or chiefly by the higher wages paid to American labor.

The tariff clause in the platform of 1908 alleges that one of the purposes of a protective policy is to—> maintain the high standard of living of the wageworkers of this country who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system.

That American manufacturing interests are handicapped by some heavy legislative burdens which may be removed in the near future can not be denied and yet even on our present basis it is a libel upon American industry to assert that the cost of production is uniformly or usually greater in this than in other countries. In spite of artificially increased cost of buildings, machinery, and raw material and in spite of the very material sacrifice of our foreign commerce entailed by our protective policy we still hold no mean rank as an exporting Nation and of our total exports very nearly one-half are the output of our factories. Germany and England alone surpass us. Our annual exports of manufactured goods are crowding the billion-dollar mark. They are about twice as great as our exports of food products. This means that we are even now meeting open competition in the world's markets in respect to numerous articles of manufacture. And this means that our cost of production can not be materially higher than the cost to our competitors. But even if it were higher the claim that higher wages are the chief or only cause is an unwarranted and unjust aspersion upon American labor. The superior intelligence of our labor due to our public-school system and our free institutions is conceded. Its greater efficiency both of mind and muscle, the result of better education and better food, is beyond question. That American labor gives better service in proportion to its better pay and that it gives as good value received for its wages as any labor on earth it ill becomes any well-informed American to dispute.

Why should the toiling masses of the United States be taxed for all time to come on the pretext that they and they only are responsible for an excessive cost of production which our great and growing export trade refutes and which, if it exists at all, is clearly due entirely or in great part to other causes?

What is meant by the word "abroad" used in the Republican platform statement? England and Japan are from our standpoint equally abroad. With which is the comparison to be made? With the nation which gives us the sharpest competition? If so, what is to be taken as the standard of cost in that nation? Its manufacturers differ from one another the same as our own. Some make large profits and others none. If it is practically impossible to get accurate figures here, how can we expect to get them from the manufacturers of a competing foreign nation?

What I have said thus far fairly raises the question as to whether the statement in the Republican platform was made in good faith. Its framers were intelligent men. They could not have overlooked these difficulties. They knew that accurate information was not obtainable and that many months would be required to procure even its semblance; and yet in the same paragraph of the same platform they promised that Congress would be called in special session immediately after the inauguration of the next President for the purpose of revising the tariff.

If the Republican Party had been sincere, would it not have followed up its announcement in the platform of 1904 with the establishment of a commission to ascertain or try to ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad? If sincere in its statement of 1908, why did it declare for a revision with such unusual haste and with the certainty that it would not have the aid of such an investigation in making the revision promised?

If President Taft considered such information essential, why did he approve the Payne-Aldrich bill, which was not only prepared without any effort to get it, but in total disregard of the principle laid down in the platform upon which he was elected? Upon what claim of consistency can he justify his approval of a bill which did not reduce the rates and his subsequent veto of a bill which did reduce the rates upon a reasonable and conservative basis, when the conditions as to information were precisely the same?

The platform provision for the guaranty of a reasonable profit to American industries can only be applied to protected industries and suggests a discrimination which every unprotected producer and every suffering consumer resents. If it were not so mischievous it would be ludicrous. The chief claim of the Republican Party for its excessive tariff rates has been that they were necessary to protect American labor, and yet it adds insult to injury by guaranteeing profits to the manufacturer without a corresponding guaranty to the laborer and without the slightest suggestion that the guaranteed profits are to be divided. [Applause.]

The Tariff Board provision of the Payne-Aldrich law met with some approval from the business community. It looked like an effort to take the tariff out of politics and place it under control of a nonpartisan board of experts, and it was hoped that this would put a stop to tariff tinkering and that it would place the tariff upon a more scientific basis. It is quite possible that a permanent tariff commission, responsive to the lawmaking branch of the Government rather than to the executive, might procure information and offer suggestions which would be helpful to Congress in the preparation of tariff bills, but it is apparent that, simple as the problem may appear at first sight, the determination of the existence of a difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and if one is found, which side it is on, what it amounts to, and what its causes are, presents a complex proposition which involves a vast number of inquiries and investigations, some of which are physically unattainable.

It is also apparent that if the figures or the conclusions of such a commission should be at variance with the facts disclosed by our actual export of manufactured goods, the latter would control. One of the inherent weaknesses of the tariff system is that the rates must be changed from time to time to meet the varying conditions of Government expenses and changes in the amount of revenues derived from other sources. Tariff revision is a legislative function which Congress can not farm out to any commission; and if it could, these changes which are deemed so detrimental to business could not be avoided.

That the present attitude of the stand-pat faction of the Republican Party upon the subject of Federal taxation is distinctly favorable to the permanent maintenance of high protective rates on all commodities now taxed, including food products and other necessaries of life, is beyond question. That some of them are opposed to the transfer of any part of Federal taxation as proposed in this bill on the ground that it will interfere somewhat with their protective policy is amply proven by the arguments they have used in this discussion.

The Democratic platform of 1904 favors "a revision and a gradual reduction of the tariff," and the Democratic platform of 1908 contained this further provision:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list, material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

It also contained these words:

> We favor an income tax as part of our revenue system.

Farm machinery, sewing machines, wire for fencing, and other articles of iron and steel, and refined sugar enter into competition with trust-controlled products, and many of these articles are sold abroad more cheaply than at home. Hence the Democratic majority in this House has consistently done everything in its power to place them on the free list. At the extra session, as well as at the present session, it has earnestly tried to make material reductions in the tariff upon the necessaries of life. This conscientious regard for party pledges is in striking contrast with the conduct of the Republican Party with reference to its own pledges. [Applause.]

In these acts and in the Democratic declaration for an income tax and in this bill, which is the fulfillment of that promise, we find the attitude of the Democratic Party upon the subject of Federal taxation.

We have already seen what the Republican promises were. We have seen that these promises were broken. In the adoption of the Payne-Aldrich bill and in their votes against a downward revision of the woolen, cotton, steel, chemical, and sugar schedules—thus, in effect, voting again in favor of the corresponding schedules in the Payne-Aldrich bill—and in the President's approval of the Payne-Aldrich bill and in his veto of every downward revision which has been placed before him, as well as in the opposition which Republican Members, under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], are making to the bill now under consideration, it is easy to determine the attitude of the Republican Party, from its acknowledged leader down, upon this important subject of Federal taxation.

The Democrats, broadly speaking, are in favor of material reduction and, where feasible, the removal of the tariff upon the necessaries of life and substituting therefor methods of taxation which will reach the people of independent means, while the stand-pat Republicans are opposed to reduction of tariff rates, and upon one pretext or another many of them are opposed to obtaining revenue by a tax upon incomes. [Applause.] If they had wanted to materially reduce the tariff on woolen clothing and woolen blankets so that the poor could more fully enjoy these comforts during the severe winter which, we hope, is now coming to an end, they had an opportunity to do so last summer. When the woolen and cotton schedules and the free-list bill came back to Congress with the President's disapproval, they again had an opportunity to lighten the poor man's burden, but refused to do so. Progressive Republicans joined with the Democrats in voting for these measures. Only a few more votes were needed to place them on the statute books. You stand-pat Republicans knew of the urgent need for tariff reduction without delay. You knew that the reductions were reasonable and based upon ample information. It would be an insult to your intelligence to assume that you took any stock in the flimsy excuses which were offered for delay, and yet in the time of need you did not come to the rescue. Your party should be and will be judged by its acts. [Applause.]

Reference is often made by the President to the platform upon which he was elected and to the popular approval of that platform which his election upon it implies. He seems to overlook the fact that there was an election in 1910. As the last pronouncement of the American people, it is worth while to consider what they really meant to declare in the 1910 election. On its face it seems to be a reversal of the verdict of two years before. Was it really so? I think not. On the contrary, it was another and more peremptory demand for a downward revision.

The nicest discriminations at popular elections must not be expected, and it seems to me that a fair interpretation of the changed vote of 1910 might thus be expressed: "The living cost is too high. The price of many kinds of food and wearing apparel is unreasonable. We don't know the cause for this condition, but we are fully satisfied that the enormous tariff taxes on most of these things are responsible for at least a portion of it. We want lower tariff rates. [Applause.] We want extortionate monopolies not only fought to a finish in the courts but destroyed by any and every means available. We prefer foreign competition to home monopolies. The high rates maintained by the Payne-Aldrich tariff law have taught us that protection is not the innocent thing we used to suppose—a mere aid to industries seeking to get a start—but, on the contrary, that it is cumulative in its character. The older an industry becomes the more protection it demands and the more corrupt influences it brings to bear to get what it wants."

Personally, I preferred and tried to get a reduction of about 50 per cent of the tariff on sugar, not because I believed that the beet-sugar industry would be destroyed by putting sugar on the free list, for the fact is that beet sugar in our country can be produced for nearly a cent a pound less than cane sugar, but I deemed it wiser and safer to sacrifice at this time less than the whole amount of the revenue derived from the tariff tax on sugar. [Applause.]

I shall vote for this measure because I deem it essential to the welfare of our people that more of the revenues of the Federal Government shall be raised by some method which is more just than a tax upon consumption, and because I believe an excise tax upon incomes exceeding $5,000 is the most just and reasonable that can be devised. If the present bill becomes a law I believe it will be held to be constitutional. It will doubtless soon be tested in the Supreme Court and its constitutionality will be determined. This may save the long delay necessary to obtain a constitutional amendment and will materially hasten the relief which our people need and demand.

As a Nation we ought to do one of two things. Either place the burden of Federal taxation more equitably than at present, or if this can not be done, if for every dollar that reaches the Federal Treasury the people must pay more than $2, and if this must be paid not in accordance with ability or the value of the property receiving protection from the Government or the magnitude of the business interests for which the Government affords facilities, but by taxation which keeps children out of school and drives them into the factory, then let us adjust our national expenditures upon the basis of the poverty which we tax rather than the wealth which practically goes untaxed, and let us discard the altruism of the Spanish War and our insular dependencies, for we have no business to create domestic misery in order to relieve the misery of foreigners. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from New York desire to use any further time?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think so. I might spend five minutes profitably in correcting some of the errors that the gentleman from Michigan has indulged in, but he has simply done it without knowing the effect of the present tariff law. He has not studied the statistics of the last six months, for if he had he would be ashamed to fall into the errors that he has.

Mr. SWEET. I would like to have the gentleman from New York point them out.

Mr. PAYNE. I will take the gentleman into my office some day and give him a kindergarten lesson and show him the grave errors that he has made about the present tariff law.

Mr. SWEET. The people of the United States have taken the gentleman from New York into their private office and given him a kindergarten lesson that he ought to remember. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. And many of them were as ignorant as to the tariff as my friend from Michigan. From the Government statistics the gentleman from Michigan ought to be ashamed to make the statement that he has.

Mr. SWEET. From the last election the gentleman from New York ought to be satisfied that the people of the country do not approve of the tariff bill which carries his name.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not the only election, we are going to have others.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; we are going to have others, but they will turn out the same as the last one, only more so.

Mr. PAYNE. Possibly, but the gentleman may be mistaken.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman from New York has been mistaken so often that the people have turned him down.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, we have done pretty well for the last 20 years without being turned down before.

Mr. SWEET. Not to the satisfaction of the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and Mr. FOSTER of Illinois having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21214, the excise-tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. MCMORRAN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. DIES, indefinitely, on account of important business.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 17119. An act granting the courthouse reserve at Pond Creek, Okla., to the city of Pond Creek for school and municipal purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Franklin Peters, Sixty-first Congress.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 19, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of St. Joseph Harbor, Mich. (H. Doc. No. 629); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Attorney General of the United States, in reply to House resolution adopted March 12, 1912, asking for information touching the existence of a smelter trust in the United States, etc. (H. Doc. No. 628); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1718) providing for the sale of the old Federal building and site at Owensboro, Ky., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 428), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARNHART, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12013) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Corsicana, Tex., certain land for alley purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 429), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15421) granting a pension to F. Byron Ridgeley; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 639) granting a pension to Anna S. Anderson; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 14436) granting a pension to James W. Fisher; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 15422) granting a pension to George W. Smith; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7078) granting a pension to Charles H. Heimlich, alias Charles H. Henderson; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20425) granting a pension to Thomas Hartman; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 1111) granting an increase of pension to Bruce Clifton; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WARBURTON: A bill (H. R. 22042) making an appropriation for the improvement of the Government road in Mount Rainier National Park; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 22043) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

TOBACCO STATISTICS.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on the Census, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13988) to authorize the Director of the Census to collect and publish additional statistics of tobacco, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 491) thereon.

MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR THE DEAD OF THE "MAINE."

Mr. PERKINS. I report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 253) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has notified the Vice President and the Members of the Senate, and the notification was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that services will be held in memory of the men of the Navy who lost their lives in the destruction of the old battleship Maine; and

Whereas it is at all times fitting that bravery and devotion to duty should be recognized and acknowledged; and

Whereas the disaster which overtook the Maine afforded evidence of the courage and steadfastness of the officers and enlisted men as conclusive as battle would have done; and

Whereas the men of the Maine who lost their lives as truly in defense of their country as though in naval action exhibited that exalted patriotism and noble heroism which have always characterized the American Navy:

Resolved, That as a testimonial of appreciation of the devotion to their country of the brave men who are to be laid to rest with deserved military honors, the Senate do, on Saturday, the 23d instant, adjourn and take part in the memorial service announced by the President.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, realizing as I do that the industrial condition with reference to the coal situation, involving the relation between employer and employee, is a most critical one, believing as I do, also, that it frequently requires but publicity of conditions and the real facts to settle those controversies, I introduce a bill which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 5901) to provide for the investigation of controversies affecting interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. DU PONT:

(By request.) A bill (S. 5902) for the relief of Alexander Mackenzie and Henry L. Abbot, both on the retired list of the United States Army; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5903) granting an increase of pension to Thomas C. Kinsey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROWN:

A bill (S. 5904) for the relief of the Victor White Coal Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A bill (S. 5905) for the relief of Charles Letts & Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 5906) to provide for the erection of a public building at Keyser, W. Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 5907) for the relief of the heirs of Mary Everitt, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 5908) to restore George W. Mathews to the Regular Army and to retire him with the rank and pay of captain; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming:

A bill (S. 5909) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and to repeal an act entitled "An act providing for writs of error in certain instances in criminal cases," approved March 2, 1907; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOURNE:

A bill (S. 5910) granting to the city of Portland, Oreg., certain strips of land from the post-office and customhouse sites in said city for street purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 5911) granting a pension to Amanda Woodcock; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 5912) granting a pension to James J. Boothe; and

A bill (S. 5913) to restore to the pension roll the name of Jordan T. Fletcher (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 5914) for the relief of Ira MacNutt (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5915) granting a pension to Matthew F. Whitcomb (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CRANE:

A bill (S. 5916) granting an increase of pension to Laura B. Stiles; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5917) relating to procedure in United States courts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing for the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va.; to the Committee on the Library.

MANUEL AGÜERO Y JUNQUÉ.

Mr. DU PONT. I introduce a joint resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Mr. Manuel Agüero y Junqué, of Cuba, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask that the accompanying letter from the Secretary of State be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution. The Secretary will read the communication from the Secretary of State.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 14, 1912.

The Hon. HENRY ALGERNON DU PONT,
Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

SIR: In compliance with a request of the Government of Cuba, made through its Minister at Washington, and with the assent of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to inclose herewith for consideration by your committee a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. Manuel Agüero y Junqué, of Habana, Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, at the expense of the Government of Cuba.

The granting of the request would be an act of courtesy without expense to this Government and in accordance with established precedents.

A similar letter has been addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
HUNTINGTON WILSON,
Acting Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I ask my colleague on the committee if he will let the joint resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs. We want to take up the appropriation bill this morning.

Mr. DU PONT. I have no objection to that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $130,000 for the improvement of Apoon Mouth of the Yukon River, Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 21477), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for the grading and macadamizing of Longfellow Street NW. from Fifth Street to Blair Road, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 17681), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. McLEAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 254), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ from time to time stenographers to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for its use, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 255), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have printed such hearings and such other papers as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects heretofore considered or to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

ADDRESS, ETC., OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN (S. DOC. NO. 439).

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I send to the desk a pamphlet which includes the first and second inaugural addresses of Abraham Lincoln, his message of July 5, 1861, his emancipation proclamation of January 1, 1863, and his Gettysburg address of November 19, 1863. I ask that the same may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION BILL (S. DOC. NO. 440).

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I present certain extracts from the report of Samuel Gompers, president, to the thirty-first annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at Atlanta, Ga., November 12–27, 1911, on the subject of the Wilson anti-injunction bill and labor's reasons for its enactment into law. I move that the matter be printed as a Senate document.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 17681, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] for a little matter.

ALICE V. HOUGHTON.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, during my absence on Saturday last, when I was necessarily absent in connection with the work of my committee, the bill (S. 5137) for the relief of Alice V. Houghton, which the Committee on Claims unanimously directed me to present to the Senate and to report favorably, was reached on the calendar under Rule VIII and it was placed under Rule IX. I do not quite understand how it came to be done in my absence. Of course it was not intentional, but it was hardly courteous either to me or to the committee which directed me to report the bill to transfer it to Rule IX, which is generally considered as a graveyard for legislation not otherwise disposed of.

It is a bill, whether Senators differ about it or not, in which some of us are much interested, and I ask unanimous consent, because I think it was done inadvertently, without knowing my wish, that the bill be restored to the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota to restore the bill to the calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that there was no intention on my part in asking that it be transferred from Rule VIII to Rule IX to cast any reflection upon him or the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that. However, it was done.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has read the RECORD he will have noticed the reason I gave for so doing. But I have not the least objection to having the bill transferred to Rule VIII.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that it be placed under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor is entered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREELEY, COLO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, provided the bill he wishes to call up does not lead to any debate.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think it will take only a few minutes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4144) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Greeley, Colo. It is a very short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Greeley, Colo., be, and the same hereby is, increased from the sum of $75,000 to the sum of $100,000, said increase to be employed in the enlargement and betterment of the building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSIGNMENT OF DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Washington, and then I will ask the Senate to proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5446) relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within the reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908. It is a short measure and it is rather important to have early action.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a desert-land entry within the exterior limits of a Government reclamation project may be assigned in whole or in part under the act of March 28, 1808 (35 Stat. L., 52), and the benefits and limitations of the act of June 27, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 520), shall apply to such desert-land entryman and his assignees: Provided, That all such assignments shall conform to and be in accordance with farm units to be established by the Secretary of the Interior upon the application of the desert-land entryman. All such assignments heretofore made in good faith may be recognized under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa if the matter does not involve any debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to have a correction made in a bill which was printed a few days ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the 15th day of the present month I introduced a bill (S. 5863) for the retirement of employees in the civil service, and for other purposes. In the seventh line of the third page the printer has made a mistake, printing "$1,600 per year" instead of "$600 per year," as the copy at least was intended to read. I desire to have that correction made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The correction will be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Substituting $600 for $1,600, and I ask that the bill be reprinted as corrected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An order therefor will be entered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17681) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the reading commences, I want in a single word to make a statement.

The increase recommended by the committee over the bill as it passed the House, which may seem large to some Senators, is to a considerable extent made up of increases due to the necessary construction of two large school buildings in the District. The amount of the increase is $1,762,056. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia in submitting their estimate made a very large cut in the estimates that were submitted to them by the heads of the various departments. The bill as reported to the Senate is $886,706 less than the revised estimates made by the commissioners.

The bill as reported to the Senate is under the estimated revenues for 1913, on the half and half basis, of $503,504, and it exceeds the law for 1912 only $6,728, notwithstanding the fact that the District is growing rapidly and increased expenditures are necessary, and the further fact, as I have stated already, that the increases to a very considerable extent are made up in view of the necessity for additional school buildings in the District.

Now, Mr. President, the reading may commence.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, before the reading proceeds, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire about how much of this bill is legislation?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will discover it as we go along. There is some legislation in the bill as it came from the other House, and there has been some legislation reported by the Senate committee, as there always is in such bills.

Mr. BROWN. The bill is a very heavy one; I have not been able to go through with it, and I wanted to get a general idea, if I could, from the Senator about how much legislation that is new is in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is comparatively little, and yet there is some, I will say to the Senator. That will develop as we go along.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General expenses," on page 2, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five," and insert "six," so as to read:

Executive office: Two commissioners, at $6,000 each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I object to that particular amendment on the ground that it is new and general legislation on an appropriation bill. I raise that question by a point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the point of order will not lie. The item is estimted for, and under the rule it is in order.

Mr. WORKS. I understand, Mr. President, that an appropriation bill——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we can not hear over on this side of the Chamber just what has occurred.

Mr. WORKS. I am making the point of order with respect to the amendment increasing the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, that it is general legislation, and that the increase of salaries ought not to be carried into an appropriation bill. Therefore, I am objecting to this proposed amendment. I am not ready to say that the increase is not proper or that that amount ought not to be allowed as salaries to the commissioners, but my own judgment is that upon principle salaries ought not to be increased in an appropriation bill. Therefore I object to the amendment on that ground, and I insist upon my point of order as well taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. GALLINGER] is correct, that the increase is made in pursuance of an estimate, the point of order does not lie.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. WORKS. That may be so. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I respectfully submit that the point of order made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is well taken, because the amendment is general legislation. It does not take it out of the rule for the item to be estimated for by proper authority.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think that the point made by the Senator from Texas is well taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not general legislation at all. The commissioners are in every bill granted a salary and an estimate has come to the committee asking for an increase of the salary. In accordance with that estimate, which is in strict conformity with the rule of the Senate, this increase is submitted to the Senate. Whether it is wise or not, of course, is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the salary of the commissioners is not fixed by law?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is fixed by the appropriation bill each year.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it not fixed by law?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is fixed by law just as every other salary is fixed by law; but, of course, it can be changed. It is not to be supposed that this——

Mr. CULBERSON. The point I make, Mr. President, is that the salary is fixed by general law, and that general law is changed when the appropriation is made $6,000 instead of $5,000. It is not taken out of the rule even if estimated for by the commissioners, whose salary they seek to have increased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that if it were general legislation the Senator's contention would be correct; but the Chair thinks it is not general legislation to change the amount of a salary for a fiscal year. It does not change the law, but it changes the salary for this fiscal year; and on that ground the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I have understood it, the general statute provides for a salary of $5,000 per annum for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. This bill appropriates $6,000 a year for the salary. Does not that, by an indirect method, operate as a repeal of the first provision? If I be not correct in that, assuming this bill should be passed, would each of the commissioners then be entitled to draw the $6,000 a year instead of $5,000 as heretofore?

Mr. GALLINGER. They would for the next fiscal year; that is all. It is not a permanent change.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, Mr. President, am I to understand that by this appropriation bill the general statute on the subject would be suspended for a year?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be suspended precisely as the statute was suspended when the Senators' salary was increased. The salary of the commissioners of $5,000 was fixed in a statute to conform with the salary of Members of the two Houses of Congress, and the same amount was named. We have managed to get our salaries increased $2,500 a year, and I should very much like to see the salary of the commissioners increased $1,000. The proposition to increase it in this bill is absolutely in conformity with the rule.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my salary, so far as I know, has been the same ever since I have been here.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator was fortunate in coming in late.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, of course I yield gracefully to the ruling of the Chair upon this question, but it seems to me to be singular that as to this appropriation, which does in fact increase the salary of a public official; the rule should be changed by the mere fact of an estimate having been made for that purpose. I can very well understand that if this is simply an appropriation for one year covering the salary the Chair is correct in the ruling that he has made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is all.

Mr. WORKS. But the effect of it undoubtedly is to increase the salary of these public officials permanently, whatever may be the technical effect of it by which the Chair's ruling is justified; but I still object to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to trespass upon the time after the Chair has ruled, but I think this is possibly an important matter, and it is with very great hesitation I am compelled to differ from the ruling of the Chair.

The purpose of the rule is that there shall not be engrafted upon an appropriation bill matter which, taken by itself, might not be passed by Congress, but by being put upon an appropriation bill its passage is in that way in a measure assured. If it were true that the salary of the commissioners was fixed each year by the appropriation bill, the ruling of the Chair would undoubtedly be correct, because in that case it would not be general legislation which is varied, but it would be the making of a law in opposition to which there was no conflicting law; in other words, it would be a necessity that it should be put in the appropriation bill just like all other provisions of appropriation bills are necessary, and in their absence there is no provision made for the payment of the money. In this case the language of the rule is that:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received.

The question is, What is "general legislation"? I think, Mr. President, that anything which varies the general law is general legislation, whether it does so temporarily or permanently. That is the ground upon which I base my conclusion. We have a general law which fixes the salary of the commissioners at $5,000 a year. This amendment proposes that for a year that general law shall be varied——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And set aside.

Mr. BACON. And set aside. It seems to me, then, that the conclusion is irresistible that anything which varies the general law is necessarily general legislation. The language is broad, it is true, but a correct interpretation of it, I think, is along the line which I have suggested.

I presume it will be conceded that if there were an item in the bill providing generally that the salary of the commissioners hereafter shall be $5,000, there would be no question of the fact that it would be in contravention of the rule. If I correctly understand the effect of the rule, it is none the less a piece of general legislation if a term is fixed during which the general law is to be varied than it would be if the change were made for all time. Suppose we should say that for the next five years the salary of the commissioners should be $6,000 instead of $5,000, as the general law now provides; that would certainly be general legislation; and to say that it shall be $6,000 for one year is, in my opinion, none the less a variation.

I beg pardon of the Chair for the liberty of suggesting that view, but for myself I am very clear in my own mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to read——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, just in further illustration of what I have said, as suggested to me by my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia], the general law fixes the salary of the commissioners for the next fiscal year, and this amendment varies the general law in that particular, and says it shall not for that year be the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. The provision will not become operative until the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstood me. I know that fact. I say the general law fixes the salary for the next fiscal year. The law now upon the statute books determines what shall be the salary of the commissioners for the fiscal year beginning June 30, and this amendment proposes to change that general law. I will say that, while the general law prescribes that the salary shall be $5,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1912, and ending June 30, 1913, by the operation of this amendment for that period the salary shall not be what the general law provides, but shall be $1,000 in addition thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the committee plants itself upon the clause in Rule XVI, which provides:

> And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

When this bill came to the committee it contained a provision for the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. An estimate came in advising an increase in those salaries, and under the provisions of Rule XVI the proposed increase has been recommended.

Mr. BACON. What is the number of the rule from which the Senator reads?

Mr. GALLINGER. Rule XVI.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, that does not in any manner conflict with the third paragraph of Rule XVI, which is the one which has been invoked, and which is undoubtedly the law of the Senate. I quote from that paragraph of Rule XVI:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

That is complete in itself. What follows has no connection with it; that is:

> Nor shall any amendment not germane, etc.

This rule goes on to specify, but the general proposition is contained in the line and a half I have read.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is reading from the third clause. I read from the latter portion of the first clause of Rule XVI.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; but, Mr. President, that is altogether a different matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is; yes. That is what I am contending.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the clause which the Senator from New Hampshire read is an additional limitation. It in no way conflicts with what my colleague was reading; but, as I have said, is an additional limitation.

Mr. BACON. The first clause is intended to meet an altogether different case:

All general appropriations shall be referred, * * * and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill.

That, Mr. President, has no reference whatever to the question of salary. If the Senator's contention is true, we could ingraft upon an appropriation bill an extensive amendment which would affect the salary of every officer and every employee of the Government. If we can do that in one case, we can do it in all cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not seriously argue that in a District of Columbia appropriation bill we could increase the salary of every officer of the Government?

Mr. BACON. Why, Mr. President, I do not know of any limitation upon the power of amendment in the Senate except the will of the Senate itself.

Mr. GALLINGER. The limitation is that the item shall be estimated for.

Mr. BACON. But, Mr. President, estimates are not made for salaries. Salaries are fixed by law. You estimate how much the digging out of a river is going to cost, or how much a public building is going to cost, and you estimate for matters of that uncertain nature, because those things can not be fixed by general law, and they are not attempted to be fixed by general law; but the salaries of officers are fixed by general law, and if they are fixed by general law, they are absolutely and specifically within the third clause of the sixteenth rule.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to call the Senator's attention to what I understand is the organic law of the District of Columbia. I read from page 103 of the United Statutes at Large, volume 20. Section 3 of that statute, among other things, provides:

And said commissioners, appointed from civil life, shall each receive for his services a compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and shall, before entering upon the duties of the office, each give bond in the sum of $50,000.

So that it does seem that there is a general statute covering this matter, and, that being so, it would seem to me that this amendment is an attempt to appropriate funds for the ensuing year in violation of the general statute on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will be content with the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, as suggestions seem to be in order, I will violate a rule of my own when I obtrude at this time a suggestion in connection with this matter. There is one aspect of it that I think makes against the ruling which the Chair has tentatively indicated. It seems that if a Senator on the floor should make a motion or offer an amendment to increase a salary, it would be out of order, whereas if the proposition came from a committee or was estimated for by the head of one of the executive departments it would therefore be within the jurisdiction of the Senate. I think that that reduces it to an absurdity. I do not believe that any executive officer has control over the proceedings of the Senate in greater degree than the Senate itself, and I do not think, in the exercise of the power lodged by the Constitution in the Senate, it should first be required to exercise its jurisdiction through the agency of one of its own committees.

If that amendment would not be in order if offered from the floor, I think it violates the provision of the rule which succeeds it, as a matter of general legislation. I do not believe that it was ever intended by anybody who understood the real meaning of that rule, or that the Senate when it drafted it, undertook to divest itself of the power to propose and enact any legislation that the Constitution permitted it to enact; and I do not believe that it can be fairly drawn out of the meaning of those words that the Senate must first have the permission of a committee or of the head of an executive department before it can proceed to exercise its constitutional power.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will simply make the suggestion to the Senator from Arkansas that if an increase were estimated for it would be entirely in order for a Senator to make the motion from the floor, provided it came within the rule.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That still does not answer the objection I made, that a Senator does not derive his power to make motions upon this floor from any suggestion of the head of an executive department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senate will have to change the rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is not mistaken about this item being estimated for? I understand that each year estimates are sent by the Secretary of the Treasury in the Book of Estimates of the amount of money required to be appropriated for salaries fixed by law. The estimates sent by the Treasury Department were for salaries as fixed by law, and a recommendation, not an estimate, comes here for the increase of the salaries of the commissioners. I say it is not an estimate, but a recommendation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the rule appealed to by the Senator from New Hampshire does not meet this question. That simply relates to an increase in the amount of the appropriation. If, in this instance, we increase the amount, we are appropriating a sum in excess of the amount due to these officers for their salaries by a thousand dollars apiece. In order to make the appropriation available at all we must change the salary, and that is the effect of this provision in the bill, not only to increase the amount, but necessarily to change the law with respect to the salary to be paid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Rule XVI has various provisions, and Rule XVI is self-imposed by the Senate itself. The Senate can provide that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations may regulate its appropriations, if it desires so to provide. It has made provision in paragraph 1 and paragraph 3 of Rule XVI in what manner appropriations shall be limited; but paragraphs 1 and 3 are two absolutely separate propositions. Under paragraph 1, had not the appropriation been estimated for—and the Chair is assuming that it was; and if the Chair is in error of course the provision must fall under the provisions of paragraph 1—but the Chair——

Mr. OVERMAN. That was the question I wanted to ask—whether this item was estimated for?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is laboring under a mistake. These estimates came in the first place from the Secretary of the Treasury, and through that official the board of commissioners recommended the increase as found in the estimates.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, let me say to the Senator, there is only a recommendation for an increase. It can not be an estimate because the estimate is for the amount of money required by statute to pay the salary. That is all the Secretary of the Treasury can estimate for.

The Secretary of the Treasury at each session of Congress sends down a book containing the estimates of the amount of money required to be appropriated for each salary. With the estimate for the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia comes a recommendation. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, estimates for the salary as fixed by law, but coupled with that estimate is a recommendation that the salaries of the commissioners be increased. It is really not an estimate, but a recommendation. Am I not right? I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is not right. It is an estimate in due course, just as estimates for increases in salaries of 200 officials of the District government were made, some of which we have allowed and some of which we have not.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia sent down the recommendation, but the Secretary of the Treasury has not estimated for it?

Mr. GALLINGER. The recommendation of the District of Columbia Commissioners goes to the Secretary of the Treasury and through the Secretary of the Treasury is transmitted to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury always sends the estimates?

Mr. GALLINGER. He does.

Mr. OVERMAN. And he could not have estimated for this increase, because it is not provided for by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to distinguish between paragraphs 1 and 3 of Rule XVI, and the Chair had concluded what he had to say about paragraph 1, that, assuming the statement to be correct that an estimate has been made for this appropriation, then paragraph 1 does not prohibit the proposed action.

Next comes the question of paragraph 3, whether or not the proposed amendment is general legislation. The Chair knows that it has been customary in both Houses of Congress to both increase and decrease salaries on appropriation bills, and the Chair thinks that the provision here is not general legislation. Of course, it would be general legislation were it in the words suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] "that hereafter," and so forth. That would make it general legislation, but in the form in which it is presented, being an appropriation for the one fiscal year, it seems to the Chair the amendment is in the nature of a limitation upon the appropriation for that fiscal year, and does not become general legislation. That is the reason that was in the Chair's mind and which impelled him to hold the point of order not well taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in order that the sense of the Senate may be taken as to the propriety of this mode of increasing salaries, independently of the rule that has been referred to, I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ayes have it.

Mr. BACON. I raise the point that no quorum has voted, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia makes the point that no quorum has voted, and apparently there is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BACON. I did not put it on that ground, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands. He did not mean to misstate the Senator's position. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Dillingham	Nixon	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	du Pont	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Fletcher	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Foster	Page	Thornton
Brown	Gallinger	Penrose	Townsend
Burnham	Guggenheim	Percy	Warren
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Watson
Chilton	Jones	Poindexter	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Pomerene	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Martin, Va.	Rayner	Works
Crane	Martine, N. J.	Richardson
Crawford	Myers	Root
Cullom	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is necessarily absent, and will be for several days.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably out of the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to occupy only a moment more. In the matter of estimates, it is provided that—

> All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction.

This item appears in the Book of Estimates as coming from the Secretary of the Treasury. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia had a salary fixed in the year 1879. It was fixed in the same amount as the salary for Members of the two Houses of Congress. No advance has been made in that salary since that time. On an appropriation bill we increased our own salaries, and I believe that was done without an estimate. On an appropriation bill we increased the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and we have increased several other salaries in the same way, including that of the President of the United States.

But this is absolutely and explicitly in accordance with the rules of the Senate and in accordance with the terms of the law, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have once been refused.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to taking the vote by yeas and nays? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I was alluding to is this statement in the Book of Estimates. It says salaries of—

> Two commissioners, at $6,000 each (increase of $1,000 each submitted).

And then it goes on to say in a note that that is a recommendation on the part of the commissioners, inasmuch as it is hard to get competent men to serve in that office for $5,000.

So, while the Secretary of the Treasury can not estimate for any more than absolutely is the salary, he does indorse the recommendation of the commissioners and notes that down, in case the Senate should see fit to increase the salary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the vote be taken.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I said in the beginning that I was not contesting the justice of this increase of salaries. I am not sufficiently informed to know whether the salary should be increased or not. Therefore I am not pressing the objection upon that ground, but on principle I am opposed to the increase of salaries in this way, and therefore I made the point of order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the vote is taken, I should like to know whether the commissioners are furnished carriages at public expense.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have 70 square miles of territory to travel over, and I think they have been allowed some kind of conveyance. They ought to be allowed a conveyance of some kind. They have to inspect every street in the District of Columbia and the sewage system and every other matter relating to the interests of the people of this Capital City. They are allowed transportation in some form or other, as are a great many other officials of the Government.

Mr. BRISTOW. Could the Senator from New Hampshire state about what appropriation is made each year for the maintenance of the carriages of the commissioners?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will find all that in this bill, so far as I know.

Mr. BRISTOW. There are a great many things in the bill. The Senator does not expect us to read it all to find out, and I supposed that the Senator from New Hampshire, chairman of the District of Columbia Committee, had that knowledge without referring us to a bill of over a hundred pages.

Mr. GALLINGER. The items will be reached in due course. I do not think I want to occupy much time in discussing the bill in a general way. I have given and the committee have given a great many serious hours to the consideration of this bill, and we have presented it to the Senate. It has been here a good while, and each Senator could have acquainted himself with all the items if he had seen fit to do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is a very general way to avoid answering a question. There are a great many bills before the Senate for its consideration. The committee has, no doubt, given a great deal of time to the consideration of the pending bill, and I thought some member could give the information for which I have asked.

Mr. GALLINGER. I may state that each commissioner has a carriage or an automobile, one or the other, at his disposal. I know that one of the commissioners does not use it, because he happens to be a man of independent means, and he does not require it. But they are given means of transportation.

Mr. CURTIS. May I suggest that they are paid for out of the general appropriation for contingent and miscellaneous expenses? The general appropriation covering all the items is some $37,000.

I should like to say to my colleague from Kansas that I happen to be on a subcommittee that has a great deal of business with the District Commissioners, and I think in one week we spent five days riding around the streets of the city of Washington examining public buildings, and we could not have done it had not the District furnished to the commissioners the public conveyance in which to go around and look after the interests of the District of Columbia.

If there are any officers in Government employ entitled to conveyances, surely the District Commissioners are.

Mr. BRISTOW. I merely wanted to know. If the Government is providing the commissioners with automobiles or carriages for their convenience, it makes the office more attractive than if such were not provided. I am not saying they are not needed in the discharge of the public duties of the commissioners, but it is certainly an element to be taken into consideration when it is proposed to increase the salaries of the commissioners. I feel I was not indulging in any breach of courtesy in endeavoring to find out what perquisites these officers have in addition to their $5,000 a year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. BRYAN's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). On account of my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were free to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. LEA (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I understand that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who is unavoidably absent, is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bourne	Fletcher	Newlands	Poindexter
Bradley	Foster	Nixon	Richardson
Brandegee	Gallinger	Oliver	Root
Brown	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Smoot

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the "Executive Office," page 2, in line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and eighty" and insert "six hundred and thirty-six"; in line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; in line 12, before the word "hundred," strike out "four" and insert "five"; and in line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to read:

Executive office: Two commissioners, at $6,000 each; engineer commissioner, $636 (to make salary $6,000); additional compensation for two assistants to the engineer commissioner, detailed from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, under act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, two at $250 each; secretary, $2,400; two assistant secretaries to commissioners, one at $1,500, and one at $1,200; clerks—one at $1,600, one at $1,500, one at $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the "executive office," on page 2, line 18, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one at $840, one at $720," and insert "two at $840 each"; and in line 20, after the word "messengers," to strike out "one at $600," and insert "two at $600 each," so as to read:

Two at $1,200 each, one who shall be a stenographer and typewriter, $1,000, two at $840 each, one at $600; messengers—two at $600 each, one at $480; stenographer and typewriter, $840; two drivers, at $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 3, to insert:

Medicines, surgical and hospital supplies, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 5, to insert:

Allowance for team, at $30 per month, $360.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, after the word "shall," to insert "hereafter"; in line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "computer (transferred from per diem roll) $1,440"; in line 19, after the word "each," to insert "four at $840 each"; and in line 20, before the word "at," to strike out "six" and insert "two," so as to read:

Purchasing division: Purchasing officer, who shall hereafter, under the direction of the commissioners, supervise the purchase and distribution of all supplies, stores, and construction materials for the use of the government of the District of Columbia, and who shall give bond in such sum as the commissioners may determine, $2,750; deputy purchasing officer, $1,700; computer (transferred from per diem roll), $1,440; clerk, $1,500; clerks—1 at $1,300, 6 at $1,200 each, 3 at $900 each, 4 at $840 each, 2 at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the purchasing division, on page 3, line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four hundred and eighty" and insert "six hundred"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "inspector, $780," and insert "inspector of materials, $900"; on page 4, line 4, before the word "inspector," to strike out "two laborers, at $600 each," and insert "two clerks, at $720 each"; and in line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "temporary labor, $150"; so as to read:

Driver, $600; inspector, $900; inspector of materials, $900; 2 clerks, at $720 each; inspector of property, $936; property-yard keeper, $1,000; inspector of materials, $1,200; temporary labor, $150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 7, to insert:

Hereafter whenever any bid or proposal for any work, material, or supplies shall be accepted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and a contract therefor is required to be signed by them, every such contract may be signed, sealed, and delivered in the name of and for and on behalf of the District of Columbia when signed by a majority of said commissioners.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the words "when signed" in line 13. It is a duplication of language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I make the point of order with respect to this clause that it is general legislation. I understand the law now provides that the action of the commissioners must be unanimous. This is an effort to change the law in that respect, and it seems to me to be quite important. Certainly it is general legislation on that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the reason for this provision is that at certain seasons of the year one of the commissioners is absent. Like most of the rest of us they take a vacation, and as at present the business of the District is greatly interrupted by not having the entire board all the time in the District of Columbia. It is not a matter of consequence to me at all, but in the administration of the office of the commissioners it is very important. I trust the Senator from California will not make a point of order against this provision, because it does no harm to anybody, and it facilitates greatly the administration of the business of the District.

Mr. WORKS. I make it, Mr. President, because I understand that this amendment grew out of the fact of a dispute upon that very question, where the parties were unable to procure unanimous consent, and that the object of this provision is to meet that condition, not the mere fact that it is inconvenient in the dispatch of business. I may be misinformed in respect to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. If there was trouble, the trouble grew out of the present situation, where unanimous concurrence is required, and one of the commissioners was absent on his vacation. They are permitted 30 days leave.

Mr. WORKS. My information is quite to the contrary, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire. It is that the commissioners were present and were unable to secure the necessary unanimous consent, and that it resulted in quite a little dissatisfaction.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so, of course the Senator does not cure that condition by insisting that the law shall remain as it is.

Mr. WORKS. My judgment about it is that there should be unanimous consent, or I would not make the point against the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I submit it to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. Evidently it is legislation. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, line 18, after the word "buildings," to insert "one at $1,400; two at $1,300 each"; in line 20, before the word "at," to strike out "eleven" and insert "eight"; in line 24, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two civil engineers or computers, at $1,500 each" and insert "civil engineer or computer, $1,600; civil engineer or computer, $1,500," so as to make the clause read:

Building inspection division: Inspector of buildings, $3,000; principal assistant inspector of buildings, $1,800; assistant inspectors of buildings—one at $1,400, two at $1,300 each, eight at $1,200 each; fire-escape inspector, $1,400; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors for such time as their services may be necessary, $3,000; civil engineer or computer, $1,600; civil engineer or computer, $1,500; chief clerk, $1,500; clerks—one at $1,050, one at $1,000, one (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter) at $1,000, one at $900; messenger, $480; assistant inspector, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 7, to strike out:

Hereafter one-half of the fees collected on account of permits, certificates, and transcripts of records issued by the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why it was lines 8 to 11, inclusive, were stricken out? It seems to me, if we are proceeding upon the theory—and we are, and I think we ought to—of paying half of the expenses of the District of Columbia, we ought to receive one-half of the receipts that come in from the fees and transcripts and certificates and permits.

Mr. GALLINGER. This was stricken out for the purpose of throwing into conference a controverted question. The committee are not clear that this is a proper disposition to make of the question. Heretofore all these fees have gone into the treasury of the District of Columbia. My personal judgment is that instead of taking one-half the fees, if we are going to make any change in the present system, the salaries of the officials who do this work ought to paid by the District of Columbia. The present provision in the House bill—and there is a still further provision along the same line—will undoubtedly add considerably to the revenues of the General Government and deplete the District revenues to that extent. But it is a question whether or not we should take one-half the revenues——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any scheme on foot to put these officers on salaries instead of fees?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are not the salaries of the officers, but the fees coming from the citizens. As an illustration, a permit to lay a sidewalk is one-half paid from the treasury of the District of Columbia——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to say this——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will allow me to conclude the sentence, I remarked that, as an illustration, when a sidewalk is laid a permit is issued for it and a fee is exacted to some extent. That sidewalk is paid for one-half out of the Treasury and one-half by the citizens. That is the class of fees this item refers to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, I see.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not fees to officers. We have nothing of that kind, so far as I know, in the District

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not only that, but transcripts of records issued by the inspector of buildings, all permits and certificates, are charged for.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may be that the House provision is a wise provision, but after all we have been going along on the half-and-half system and these fees have been turned into the treasury of the District of Columbia. Now the House has raised an issue. It may be a wise issue, but the committee wanted to confer with the House Members about it in conference and try to adjust the matter equitably and satisfactorily all along the line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator think there will be a free and full conference on the subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not any doubt with reference to the District bill. We have a conference extending over a good many days, and we always reach, as we believe, wise conclusions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that before I reached this very exalted station, when I was a Member of the House, I found that when we went into conference with the Senate, unless there was unanimous consent on the part of 92 Senators we could not prevail in conference; in other words, the Senate conferees never divided. I do not know what they are doing now, but they stood by one another.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, the Senate——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to say this, Mr. President: I want to see Washington the best governed, the most beautiful, and the most liberally treated city in the world. I think it deserves to be all of that, because it is the capital of this great country. I believe in the half-and-half principle of running the District for very many reasons, which I shall not enter into now. I think we ought to make of Washington the model city of the United States in its schools, in its sanitary arrangements, in its cleanliness, in its police and fire protection, and in every other way; but I think that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, if the Senate will excuse a plantation phrase, ought to "tote fair," and if we are going to pay for half of all the expenditures in the District, then these little driblets—they do not amount to much—which are paid by the citizens of the District for public services, permits, certificates, transcripts, and so forth, ought to be divided half and half, too; and I think it is better for the District that they should be divided, because there will then be less chance of arousing prejudice and antagonism toward the half-and-half principle which hitherto has regulated our legislation. So that in the interest of the District itself, it seems to me, we ought not to be picayunish about dividing the receipts while we are dividing the expenditures; and I hope that when the matter comes back from conference it will be found that the House conferees have overpersuaded, to use another plantation phrase, the Senate conferees in this regard.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the House conferees are very much in the habit of overpersuading the Senate conferees. In every bill since——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me a moment—in every bill that I have had anything to do with the House conferees certainly have got their share in the matter of amendments. I simply want personally to try to have this matter adjusted. There is an agitation which, in my opinion, unless there is some adjustment of the matter, will destroy the half-and-half principle upon which we have been operating since 1879. If we can equitably arrange it in this bill, it will be, in my judgment, a very wise thing to do. That is what I want to do; I want to do it fairly; and I think we will be able to accomplish that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it right that this money should go into the General Treasury; and if so, why should we not make the proper record now instead of disagreeing with something proper that the House has done?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have said, Mr. President, that I am not at all sure that this is the best way to do it. My impression has been that where the General Government pays one-half of the salaries of the officials of a District office in which fees are collected, instead of taking one-half the receipts and depleting the District revenues to that extent, and possibly preventing the development that the Senator from Mississippi and I are so anxious for, it might be a more equitable way for the District to pay the salaries of that office and then take all the revenues derived from it; but I want to consult with the House conferees on that very point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, as a matter of fact, in these particular cases the fees, if I may call them such, do not go to the officers; they go into the treasury of the District; but the identical officers in whose names the fees are collected are paid salaries, and the General Treasury of the United States pays one-half of those salaries.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. And gets no part of the fees?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And gets no part of the fees. They are already upon a salary basis; the General Government is paying half of the salaries. Now, as a matter of fact, these fees do go very largely toward making up the amounts paid out in salaries. Possibly in some cases they make up more than is paid out in salaries; and it seems to me that one of two things ought to take place—either the District treasury should receive the fees and pay the salaries or else both treasuries ought to receive the fees and out of both treasuries the salaries should be paid. I think it is fair that the latter of the two plans should prevail, because then automatically the half-and-half principle prevails, whereas if all the receipts go into the District treasury and there is a difference between receipts and expenditures the half-and-half principle no longer prevails.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator may be right, and I assure him that, so far as I am concerned, it will be given very careful consideration. I have no prejudice about it at all, only I think this is a good time to adjust the matter, and the only way to do it is to throw the matter into conference. There are one or two other items along the same line.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would the Senator give us the amount annually covered by this provision?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not now do so, I will say to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, substantially.

Mr. GALLINGER. I say I can not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did the Senator state that it included the one-half paid by the property holders for sidewalk improvements?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not so sure now about that, but I think it does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the Senator to say that it did.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I think it does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, it must be quite a large sum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, quite a sum. It will be given very careful consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, it seems to me that we put ourselves in a very peculiar position if we decline to agree to this proposition because the House inserted it. It is clearly right; and if it is right, why should we make a wrong record here on it? I think the provision ought to remain in the bill, and we ought not to strike it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the amendment may prevail, so that the matter may be more calmly considered by the conference committee than it can be in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody is excited.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there a place where consideration can be calmer than it is in the Senate? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division. I understand the amendment strikes out the House provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment strikes out the language in the House bill, and the Senator from Georgia thinks it ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and the Chair was about to decide that the "ayes" prevailed, and that the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the "ayes" carried it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Upon that I demand a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], and I wish this statement to stand on all votes to-day.

Mr. LEA (when Mr. TAYLOR's name was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is detained from the Chamber by illness.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I again transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote. If I were free to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The general pair which I have with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I transfer to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], the transfer to stand for all votes to-day. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA (after having voted in the negative). In voting, I should have stated that I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. He is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and voted to report the pending bill, and I assume he is in favor of this amendment. Therefore I will let my vote stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas are 29, nays 11. Not a quorum of the Senate has voted.

Mr. GALLINGER (at 1 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.). I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

At 1 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m. Mr. CRAWFORD entered the Chamber and responded to his name, voting "yea."

At 1.43 p. m. Mr. PENROSE entered the Chamber and responded to his name, voting "yea."

At 1.44 p. m. Mr. PERCY entered the Chamber and said: I am paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

At 1.45 o'clock p. m. Mr. NEWLANDS entered the Chamber and voted "yea."

At 1.46 o'clock p. m. Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and voted "yea."

At 1.47 o'clock p. m. Mr. RAYNER entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the senior Senator from Maryland voted?

Mr. RAYNER. He has not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER answered "present."

At 1.48 o'clock p. m. Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas entered the Chamber and voted "nay."

At 1.49 o'clock p. m. Mr. FOSTER and Mr. THORNTON entered the Chamber and each voted "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 13, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 15, before the word "roads," to strike out "county" and insert "suburban."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Purely for information, I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I notice in line 14 the word "county" is stricken out and the word "suburban" is inserted. I do not understand how the word "county" ever got there at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that they had at one time the county of Washington, which I think included all the territory north of the so-called boundary, which is Florida Avenue, and they have continued to use the word "county" up to the present time. It occurred to me that "suburban" is a much better word.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or almost any other word, since the county was abolished.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; or almost any other word.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have had no information that any Senator desires to discuss the unfinished business to-day. I therefore ask that it may be temporarily laid aside, and will state that I shall not call it up during the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The appropriation bill will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 12, line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred," and in line 16, before the word "dollars," to insert "three hundred," so as to read:

Engineer commissioner's office: Engineer of highways, $3,000; engineer of bridges, $2,250; superintendent of streets, $2,000; superintendent of suburban roads, $2,200; superintendent of sewers, $3,300; inspector of asphalts and cements, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the engineer commissioner's office, on page 13, line 4, before the word "at," to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to read:

Assistant engineers—one at $2,200, one at $2,100, five at $1,800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the engineer commissioner's office, on page 13, line 20, before the word "including," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in line 21, after the word "each," to strike out "one at $1,000"; in line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert "property-yard keeper, $1,000"; in line 24, after the word "dollars," to insert "one at $1,000"; and in line 25, before the word "at," to strike out "ten" and insert "nine," so as to read:

Inspectors—2 at $1,500 each; 7, including 3 inspectors of streets, at $1,200 each; 1 at $900; property-yard keeper, $1,000; foremen—12 at $1,200 each, 1 at $1,050, 1 at $1,000, 9 at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the Engineer Commissioner's Office, on page 14, line 7, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred"; in line 9, before the word "at," to strike out "two" and insert "four"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "3 at $1,400 each" and insert "1 at $1,400"; in line 11, before the word "at," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; in line 12, before the word "at," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 13, after the word "dollars," to strike out "1 at $840; 2 at $750 each" and insert "2 at $840 each, 1 at $750"; in line 16, before the word "at," to strike out "one" and insert "five"; and in line 17, before the word "at," to strike out "six" and insert "two," so as to read:

Bridgekeepers—1 at $650, 3 at $600 each; chief clerk, $2,250; permit clerk, $1,500; assistant permit clerk, $1,200; index clerk and typewriter, $900; clerks—1 at $1,800, 4 at $1,500 each, 1 at $1,400, 6 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each, 1 at $900, 2 at $840 each, 1 at $750, 1 at $600; mesengers—5 at $600, 2 at $540 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 9, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the engineer commissioner's office, from $179,810 to $186,340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 12, after the word "duty," to insert "hereafter," so as to read:

Municipal architect's office: Municipal architect, whose duty hereafter it shall be to prepare or supervise the preparation of plans for, and superintend the construction of, all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the municipal architect's office, on page 16, line 3, after the word "dollars," to strike out "1 at $620" and insert "2 at $840 each"; in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four thousand eight hundred and fifty" and insert "twenty-five thousand nine hundred and ten," so as to read:

Clerks—1 at $1,050; 2 at $840 each; copyist, $840; driver, $540; in all, $25,910.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 12, to insert:

For runabout, or automobile, for the superintendent of construction, and for repair and maintenance of same, $1,500.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, that is another automobile, I see, that the Government is purchasing. What necessity is there for this additional automobile? I should like to inquire about how many automobiles and carriages combined the government of the District of Columbia has purchased and that are being used by District officials?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not, I regret to say, answer the Senator's question offhand. That could only be determined by making an inquiry of the officials at the Municipal Building.

This particular official goes all over the District of Columbia, 70 square miles, in repairing school buildings and other buildings. He has doubtless a conveyance of some description now, probably a horse and carriage, or he hires a conveyance. It was argued in the hearings that this would be a matter of economy, that he would go much more rapidly and economize his time, and that the appropriation ought to be made. I will read precisely what was said about it. I inquired:

How does he get around?

Maj. JUDSON. He gets around with a horse and buggy, and he has to go to the municipal buildings scattered all over the District. I think myself it would add greatly to his efficiency to give him this runabout.

Senator SMOOT. If we gave it to him, he could do away with his horse and buggy?

Maj. JUDSON. Yes, sir; he would do away with his horse and buggy.

Senator GALLINGER. He does not supply his own team?

Maj. JUDSON. No. I think no private corporation would fail to give him a runabout for its own interest under similar circumstances.

That is exactly what developed in the hearing. It was argued that it was a matter of economy rather than of profligacy, and the committee were persuaded.

Mr. BRISTOW. There is an effort, or has been in years past, on the part of a number of other District officials to secure automobiles. Of course they are to be used, I suppose, in a way for their official business, and also very largely for personal comfort. I know I frequently see these officials enjoying the cool of the evening in Government automobiles, at public expense. Some argument is made, of course, when the Appropriation Committees are considering these things to do away with the old-fashioned horse and buggy, which is much more cheaply maintained, and to get an automobile, which can take the whole family. A horse and buggy will take only two, and sometimes, when there are numerous members of the family, they prefer the five-passenger machine. The town is full of them, in my judgment, and sometimes on the streets it is hard work for those of us who plod around as best we can to keep from being run over by these Government automobiles in the hands of city officials, presumably on official business occasionally.

I do not want to object to an automobile where it is used for official business and is a matter of economy, but I do object to the Government providing these subordinate officials here not only with very competent salaries, but also with all the luxuries of automobiles that cost some thousand and fifteen hundred dollars a year to maintain.

Mr. GALLINGER. The further statement was made that—

One building is at Burrville, near the eastern line of the District, and one at Thirty-sixth Street west, 8 miles apart. One at First and I Streets south, and another at Brightwood north, 6½ miles apart. We must cover nearly 40 miles a day to visit all the buildings under construction and the supervision of this office. The horse could not cover more than one-third of this daily travel, so that, figuring on the mile cost, our machine has cost for the last six months $1.37 per day, or 3.42 cents per mile, while a horse costs 5.82 cents per mile.

The further suggestion was made that a horse does not stand that work very long.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, all these buildings are on street car lines.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not all of them, I will say to the Senator. The street car lines in this District are very inadequate to reach all sections of the city, I think altogether too much so. I think we ought to have more.

Mr. BRISTOW. Many times one can make a trip in a street car just as quickly as in an automobile, and with less danger to the public.

I think I will have to ask for a vote on the committee amendment. I want to vote against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will be content with a viva voce vote?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 17, after the word "clerks," to insert "2 at $1,500 each"; in line 18, before the word "at," to strike out "seven" and insert "five"; and in line 21, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twelve thousand nine" and insert "thirteen thousand five," so as to make the clause read:

Special assessment office: Special assessment clerk, $2,000; clerks—2 at $1,500 each, 5 at $1,200 each, 2 at $900 each, 1 at $750; in all, $13,550.

each, two at $650 each; computer and transitman, $1,200; in all, $26,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 24, before the word "maintenance," to insert "exchange and," and in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "six," so as to make the clause read:

For services of temporary draftsmen, computers, laborers, additional field party when required, purchase of supplies, care and hire of teams, exchange and maintenance of a motor vehicle, $6,000, all expenditures hereunder to be made only on the written authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 3, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the surveyor's office from $30,725 to $32,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 6, after the word "Library," to strike out ", including Takoma Park branch"; in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand"; in the same line, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; in line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "chief industrial division, $1,000; chief catalogue division, $1,000"; in line 14, after the word "dollars," to strike out "assistant in charge of work for the blind, $1,200"; in line 15, after the word "dollars," to strike out "six" and insert "five"; in line 17, before the word "at," to strike out "including one in charge of Takoma Park branch"; in line 18, after the word "each," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; in line 19, after the word "two," to strike out "including in charge of Takoma Park branch"; and in line 21, before the word "nine," to strike out "cataloguer" and insert "classifier," so as to read:

Free Public Library: Librarian, $4,000; assistant librarian, $1,600; chief circulating department, $1,300; chief industrial division, $1,000; chief catalogue division, $1,000; children's librarian, $1,000; librarian's secretary, $900; reference librarian, $1,000; assistants—one at $1,000, five at $720 each, four at $600 each, three at $540 each, two at $480 each; copyist, $480; classifier, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the Free Public Library, on page 20, line 5, after the word "watchman," to strike out "janitor of Takoma Park branch, $360," and in line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "four hundred and forty," so as to read:

Two janitors, at $480 each, one of whom shall act as night watchman; engineer, $1,080; fireman, $720; workman, $600; library guard, $720; two cloakroom attendants, at $360 each; six charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $42,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 22, after the word "Library," to strike out ", including Takoma Park branch," so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous, Free Public Library: For purchase of books, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 21, to insert:

Hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to enter into contract or contracts for binding books for the Public Library for periods not exceeding three years, subject to annual appropriations of Congress, under such conditions and specifications as they may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 7, before the word "maintenance," to insert "purchase and," and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For fuel, lighting, fitting up buildings, including lunch-room equipment, purchase and maintenance of motor cycle, and other contingent expenses, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 10, to insert:

Takoma Park Branch Library: For maintenance, employment of branch librarian and assistants, substitutes, and other special and temporary services, extra services for Sundays and holidays, purchase of books, periodicals, binding, fuel, and other contingent expenses, the rates of compensation of all employees to be determined by the board of library trustees, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Contingent and Miscellaneous Expenses," on page 22, line 5, after the word "dollars" to insert "membership dues of the District of Columbia in the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill about the provision on page 22, lines 5 and 6. Why should we make a public appropriation for membership dues of the District of Columbia in the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners? What have the people or the Government to do with that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, just this: If this official keeps in touch with insurance matters he must become a member, or he ought to become a member, of this convention and attend its meetings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the name of the official?

Mr. GALLINGER. The name of the official is George W. Ingham.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean the title of his office.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is superintendent of insurance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is his public title?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is his designation. He spent himself $80 last year. This is not a very large amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if it is usual in the States to provide for the payment of the expenses of these people or do the insurance companies pay them?

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that this expense of the insurance commissioner is paid in my State, and I think it is an almost universal custom.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is a public official?

Mr. GALLINGER. He is a public official.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And he attends these meetings in the capacity of a public official for the purpose of arriving at some sort of uniform insurance regulations?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir; and it is very necessary, so far as the insurance laws in this District are concerned, to keep well informed, because they need a good deal of amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is all right, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-four thousand five hundred" and insert "thirty-seven thousand," so as to read:

For contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, namely: For printing, checks, books, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, stationery; detection of frauds on the revenue; surveying instruments and implements; drawing materials; binding, rebinding, repairing, and preservation of records; maintaining and keeping in good order the laboratory and apparatus in the office of the inspector of asphalt and cement; damages; livery, purchase, and care of horses and carriages or buggies not otherwise provided for; horseshoeing; ice; repairs to pound and vehicles; use of bicycles by inspectors in the engineer department not to exceed $800; membership dues of the District of Columbia in the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, and other general necessary expenses of District offices, including the sinking-fund office, Board of Charities, excise board, personal-tax board, harbor master, health department, surveyor's office, superintendent of weights, measures, and markets office, and department of insurance, and purchase of new apparatus and laboratory equipment in office of inspector of asphalt and cement, $37,000; and the commissioners shall so apportion this sum as to prevent a deficiency therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall move that the proviso from line 16 to line 23 be stricken out. I do not see any good it can do except to encourage falsehood and hypocrisy. The proviso reads:

Provided, That horses and vehicles appropriated for in this act shall not be used by the commissioners for any other purpose than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit in order to enable them to inspect or inform themselves concerning any public work or property belonging to the said District or to do any other act necessary to the administration of its affairs.

If we are going to provide these vehicles and motors and things of that sort there is no use putting these people in the attitude of going on record that they never will use them for anything except a public purpose. Of course you know they will. Of course they know beforehand they will. If a man has his horse and buggy or his automobile provided at public expense and wants to go to see his sister-in-law of a Sunday evening he is going in it, or if he wants his mother-in-law to go and see somebody she is going. I do not see any use in cumbering up the public statutes with a proviso that merely makes liars out of men. I move to strike out the proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi moves to strike out the proviso on page 22, beginning in line 16 and continuing to line 24.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven," so as to make the clause read:

For postage for strictly official mail matter, $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 4, before the word "dollars," to insert "eight hundred," so as to read:

For purchase and maintenance, hire or livery, of means of transportation for the coroner's office and the morgue, jurors' fees, witness fees, removal of deceased persons, making autopsies, ice, disinfectants, telephone service, and other necessary supplies for the morgue, and the necessary expenses of holding inquests, including stenographic services in taking testimony, and photographing unidentified bodies, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "three," so as to make the clause read:

For the enforcement of the game and fish laws of the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 21, after the word "horse-drawn," to insert "vehicles used for business purposes"; in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seven hundred and fifty" and insert "one thousand two hundred"; and in line 24, after the word "necessary," to insert "to be immmediately available," so as to make the clause read;

For the purchase of enamel metal or leather identification number tags for horse-drawn vehicles used for business purposes and motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, $1,200, or so much thereof as may be necesssary, to be immediately available.

Mr. BRISTOW. "For the purchase of enamel metal or leather identification number tags." Are we to understand from this provision that it requires $1,200 a year to secure tags for the automobiles and carriages that the Government is furnishing these officials? Does it require that much to tag them?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not furnishing the officials. It includes horse-drawn vehicles for business purposes. They are likewise tagged in this District.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is to supply the tags to the business men?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not understand it was.

Mr. GALLINGER. They paid back $5,000 for fees last year.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not understand it. I thought it was for tags on the automobiles furnished.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 9, before the word "repairs," to strike out "minor," so as to make the clause read:

For maintenance and repairs to the District of Columbia markets, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 10, to insert:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered hereafter, when in their discretion it shall be deemed to the advantage of the public service, to exchange typewriters, adding machines, pianos, machinery, and other equipment, in part or full payment, for new articles of similar or improved character, credit for the value of said personal property so exchanged to be allowed on vouchers in payment for such new articles as may be purchased, the balance remaining due after said credit to be paid out of the appropriation to which said purchase is properly chargeable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Improvements and repairs," on page 26, line 24, before the word "thousand," to insert "and forty," so as to make the clause read:

Assessment and permit work: For assessment and permit work, $240,000.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "fifty-seven thousand one" and insert "eighty-one thousand four," so as to make the clause read:

Work on streets and avenues: For work on streets and avenues named in Appendix M, Book of Estimates, 1913, $81,400, to be expended in the discretion of the commissioners upon streets and avenues specified in the schedules named in said appendix and in the aggregate for each schedule as stated herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "Five thousand six" and insert "Eleven thousand nine," so as to make the clause read:

Southwest section schedule: $11,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "Ten" and insert "Twenty-five," so as to make the clause read:

Southeast section schedule (including Pennsylvania Avenue, north side, from Thirteenth Street to Fourteenth Street, and E Street from Sixteenth Street to Seventeenth Street): $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "Ten" and insert "Thirteen," so as to make the clause read:

Norheast section schedule (including K Street from Fourth Street to Fifth Street): $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 29, to insert:

For paving the north roadway of B Street NW., between Seventeenth Street and Virginia Avenue, and Virginia Avenue NW., between B Street and Eighteenth Street, $7,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 17, after the word "alleys," to strike out "when authorized by law," so as to make the clause read:

Condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys: For purchase or condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 19, before the word "roads," to strike out "county" and insert "suburban"; in line 20, before the word "roads," to strike out "county" and insert "suburban"; and in line 22, before the word "roads," to strike out "county" and insert "suburban," so as to make the clause read:

Construction of suburban roads: For construction of suburban roads and suburban streets, to be disbursed and accounted for as "Construction of suburban roads and suburban streets," and for that purpose it shall constitute one fund, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 5, after the word "from," to strike out "Jefferson" and insert "Jackson," so as to make the clause read:

Northeast. Jackson Street, from Tenth to Twelfth Streets, and Tenth Street, from Jackson to Kearney Streets, grade and improve, $2,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 7, to insert:

Southeast. Streets in Anacostia, grade and improve, $3,000;
Northwest. Fessenden Street, Wisconsin Avenue to River Road, grade and improve, $6,200;
Northwest. Illinois Avenue, Kennedy to Ingraham Streets, and Kennedy Street from Ninth Street to Georgia Avenue, grade and improve, $8,700;
Northwest. Kalmia Street, from end of macadam to Rock Creek Park, grade and improve, $10,200;
Northwest. Eighth Street, Jefferson to Longfellow Streets, grade and improve, $2,300;
Northwest. Tilden Street, from end of asphalt to Rock Creek Park, grade and improve, $14,500;
Northwest. Hamilton Street, Georgia Avenue to Illinois Avenue, grade and improve, $3,000;
Northeast. Monroe Street, Fifteenth Street to Seventeenth Street, grade and improve, $3,500;
Southeast. Twenty-third Street, Naylor Road to R Street, and R Street, Naylor Road to Twenty-second Street, grade, $3,500;
Northeast. Hunt Place, Dean Avenue, and Grant Street, Minnesota Avenue to Division Avenue, $5,000;
Northeast. Hamlin Street, from Rhode Island Avenue to Twentieth Street, grade and improve, $2,600;
Northeast. Eighteenth Street, from Newton to Irving Streets, grade and improve, $7,300;
Northeast. Seventeenth Street, from Hamlin Street to Rhode Island Avenue, grade and improve, $7,600; Northeast. Thirteenth Street, Rhode Island Avenue to Franklin Street, grade, $3,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 23, to increase the total appropriation for the construction of suburban roads and suburban streets from $74,725 to $155,525.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 1, after the word "macadam," to strike out "or wood blocks"; so as to make the clause read:

Hereafter the use of bituminous macadam is authorized on streets, avenues, and roads to be improved or paved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, on page 34, line 19, after the word "collected," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a thorough investigation of the operation of municipal asphalt plants in cities where they are in operation, report to be made to Congress at the beginning of the next session. Said report shall give in detail the original cost of each plant, the annual expenditures for repairs and betterments, the output, the character and quality of pavement laid down in each case, the cost per yard, the length of time for which it is guaranteed, and shall also include an estimate of the lowest price at which the existing asphalt plant in the District of Columbia can be purchased.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 22 of the amendment, after the words "investigation of," I move to strike out the words "the operation of." They are not necessary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 35, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten"; so as to make the clause read:

For replacing and repairing sidewalks and curbs around public reservations and municipal buildings, $10,000.

For planting and care of trees in public-school grounds, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred and twenty"; in line 6, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred and fifty"; in line 8, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five"; and in line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and eighty" and insert "nine hundred and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

Bathing beach: For superintendent, $720; watchman, $480; temporary services, supplies, and maintenance, $2,250; for repairs to buildings, pools, and the upkeep of the grounds, $1,500, to be immediately available; in all, $4,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to make the clause read:

Playgrounds: For maintenance, repairs, including labor, equipment, supplies, and necessary incidental and contingent expenses, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 15, to insert:

For repairs and replacement of apparatus and other equipment on the playgrounds, including painting, grading, fencing, cutting grass, and resurfacing, to be immediately available so that the grounds may be fully equipped and ready for operation on July 1, 1912, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five"; in line 5, before the word "directors," to strike out "nine" and insert "eleven"; in line 12, before the word "assistants," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine"; in line 14, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight"; in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-five" and insert "seventeen thousand seven hundred and eighty-five," and, in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "which sum shall be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries: Clerk, $840; supervisor, 10 months, at $175 per month; directors, assistant directors, and watchmen, to be employed not exceeding seven months, as follows: Eleven directors, at $75 per month each; 2 assistant directors, at $60 per month each; 1 assistant director, at $50 per month; 1 watchman, at $25 per month. To be employed not exceeding three months, as follows: Seven assistant directors, at $60 per month each; 3 assistant directors, at $50 per month each; 5 assistants, at $45 per month each; 9 assistants, at $40 per month each; 2 watchmen, at $45 per month each; and 8 watchmen, at $45 per month each for 12 months; in all, $17,785.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nineteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-five" and insert "twenty-five thousand seven hundred and eighty-five," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for playgrounds, $25,785.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 1, before the word "of," to strike out "condemnation" and insert "board for condemnation," so as to make the subhead read:

Board for condemnation of insanitary buildings:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Electrical department," on page 43, line 12, before the word "electrical," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to read:

Electrical engineer, $2,500; assistant electrical engineer, $2,000; 4 electrical inspectors, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the electrical department, on page 44, line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "forty-six thousand four" and insert "forty-seven thousand six," so as to read:

In all, $47,695.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 16, after the word "section," to strike out "eight" and insert "seven," so as to make the clause read:

Lighting: For the purchase, installation, and maintenance of public lamps, lamp-posts, street designations, lanterns, and fixtures of all kinds on streets, avenues, roads, alleys, and public spaces, and for all necessary expenses in connection therewith, including rental of stables and storerooms, this sum to be expended in accordance with the provisions of section 7 of this act and other laws applicable thereto, wwery and extra labor, $386,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase and installation of 10 fire-alarm boxes, and for the purchase and erection of the necessary poles, cross arms, insulators, pins, braces, wire, cable, conduit connections, posts, extra labor, and other necessary items, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 2, to insert:

For the purchase and maintenance of one motor vehicle, with extra tires and equipment, $2,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I will inquire what this motor vehicle is for?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that it is for carrying material for the electrical department to various places in the city.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not an automobile, then, for the use of the officials?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not an automobile of that character, I can assure the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to do away with horses and wagons.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator from Utah says, it is to do away with horses and wagons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Washington Aqueduct," on page 46, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "thirty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

For operation, including salaries of all necessary employees, maintenance, and repair of the Washington Aqueduct and its accessories, including Conduit Road, the McMillan Park Reservoir, the Washington Aqueduct tunnel, and also including the maintenance of one motor truck, horses, vehicles, and harness, and the care and maintenance of the stable, $38,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 12, to insert:

For beginning surfacing and improvement of the Conduit Road, from Foxhall Road to Great Falls, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "twelve," so as to make the clause read:

For continuing the lining of such portions of the unlined sections of the tunnels of the Washington Aqueduct as may be necessary to prevent the disintegration and fall of rock, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, after line 10, to insert:

For completing the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters, to be placed on the water services of the Marine Barracks, Soldiers' Home, Howard University, Freedman's Hospital, Walter Reed Hospital, and Zoological Park, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, said meters to be purchased, installed, and maintained by and remain under the observation of the officer in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, $4,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, after line 23, to insert:

The Chief of Engineers, United States Army, is authorized and directed to transfer to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as a public highway the strip of land 50 feet in width, designated as lots 15 and 18, square 2527, and extending from Wyoming Avenue to Kalorama Road, said lots having been purchased in connection with the construction of the Washington Aqueduct tunnel: Provided, That when said highway is improved the air shaft now located thereon shall be turned at a sufficient depth below the street level and brought up into a vault, to be constructed under the sidewalk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Great Falls Water Power," on page 49, line 10, after the word "project," to strike out "Provided, That the total cost of the investigation and all services authorized by this paragraph shall not exceed the sum of $10,000," and in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed, through the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, to investigate and report to Congress at the beginning of its next session on the questions of the present water supply in the District of Columbia and the sufficiency of its source at the Great Falls of the Potomac River to supply the present and future needs of the United States and of the District of Columbia for water; also the availability of the water power at said Great Falls or vicinity on the Potomac River, or between Great Falls and the District of Columbia, for the purpose of supplying light and power for uses of the United States and of the government of the District of Columbia, and to prepare complete plans, maps, specifications, and estimates for the production, distribution, and utilization of the maximum electrical power that can be economically created and employed for such uses, including street lighting in the District of Columbia; said plans, maps, and specifications shall be sufficient in detail to form the basis of a contract or contracts for the execution of the work, and the map, supplemented if necessary by a report, shall indicate all of the lands that are required to be taken or flowed and the water and water rights that are required to be taken for the purpose of the execution of the project. For expenses of this investigation and report, including all necessary expert and other personal services, there is appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire what the showing was which led to the increase of this appropriation from $10,000 to $20,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the hearings, Mr. President, the engineer commissioner testified as follows:

Maj. JUDSON. We think that the appropriation that was in the estimates is better than this appropriation that is in the House bill. We think that the appropriation should be $20,000 instead of $10,000. We know it. You could not do anything worth while for $10,000. You would not get ahead at all. You would waste $10,000. We have already had some reports made, in times past, and they would come just up to where they had gotten before, when the $10,000 would give out and you would not get ahead any at all. We think that the provision should come out that was inserted on the floor of the House by amendment, and that the total amount for the investigation should be $20,000. That is a very big proposition, and $20,000 is the least that would enable the Secretary of War to give the Chief of Engineers the proper experts and assistants to carry on this work.

That was the statement, I will say to the Senator, and further it was stated by the engineer commissioner that—

They would have to employ experts. The Corps of Engineers are not specialists on that kind of work. We know, generally, that they would have to employ experts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, it is expected that the work will be done simply under the supervision of the Corps of Engineers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not expected that the Corps of Engineers will themselves do the work?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not the special or expert part of the work.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Army engineers were more expert than anybody else on that particular subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Maj. Judson, the engineer commissioner, is a very distinguished engineer, and he states to the contrary. Furthermore, of course the engineer officers are very hard-worked men, and to-day there is a demand for more engineers rather than less.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can well understand that if it is the purpose to employ other engineers to do the work, the amount appropriated here may be required; but I could not understand, if the Army engineers themselves were to do it, how the expenditure could possibly be incurred.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Army engineers could not well be diverted from their usual work for work of this kind, except to supervise it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there any authority here for the employment of outside engineers?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not see any.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read from the bill:

For expenses of this investigation and report, including all necessary expert and other personal services, there is appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I think that covers it absolutely.

Mr. CUMMINS. The paragraph begins:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed, through the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, to investigate and report to Congress.

And so forth.

Well, I will not raise the point about the amendment if it is intended that outside service shall be secured.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly the purpose, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Public schools," on page 49, line 26, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred," and on page 50, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "fifty-two thousand seven" and insert "fifty-three thousand two," so as to make the clause read:

Officers: Superintendent of public schools, $5,500; two assistant superintendents, at $3,000 each; director of intermediate instruction, 13 supervising principals, and supervisor of manual training, 15 in all, at a minimum salary of $2,200 each; secretary, $2,000; clerk, $1,400; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk to carry out the provisions of the child-labor law, $900; two stenographers, at $840 each; messenger, $720; in all, $53,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 11, after the word "officers," to strike out "Two attendance officers, at $600 each; attendance officer, $900," and insert "Chief attendance officer, $900; 2 attendance officers, at $600 each," so as to make the clause read:

Attendance officers: Chief attendance officer, $900; 2 attendance officers, at $600 each; in all, $2,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 17, before the word "teachers," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-two," so as to make the clause read:

Teachers: For 1,772 teachers, to be assigned as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 14, after the word "including," to strike out "two" and insert "three," and in line 16, before the words "in all," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "ninety-seven," so as to read:

Teachers in group A of class 6, including 3 principals of grade manual-training schools, 297 in all, at a minimum salary of $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 17, after the word "each," to insert:

Provided, That all teachers of manual training, drawing, domestic science, domestic art, music, physical culture, and kindergarten practice teachers, in the normal, high, and manual-training high schools, and assistants to the directors of primary instruction, now in the service of the public schools and hereafter to be appointed, shall be placed in class 6, group A: Provided further, That the provisions contained in the acts approved May 26, 1908, and May 18, 1910, relative to the longevity placing of teachers in class 6, group A, for previous years of experience in teaching in accredited normal, high, and manual-training schools, shall not apply to any teacher now in the service of the public schools, or hereafter to be appointed, placed in said class 6, group A, by reason of this proviso; but no teacher so placed in class 6, group A, shall receive less salary than he would receive in the lower class: And provided further, That hereafter no teacher of any of these subjects shall be appointed without like requirements to those required of teachers of academic and scientific subjects in the high schools.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out, in line 23, the language beginning with "Provided further," and continuing down to the words "lower class," in line 9, on page 52, and to substitute for it, after "group A," a comma and the following language:

At the salary in class 6, group A, next higher than the salary said teachers are now receiving in classes 4 and 5: Provided further, That they shall hereafter receive their annual increase in salary as provided for class 6, group A, in the act of June 8, 1906.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if that means only that they shall not receive longevity for their previous years of teaching in the lower schools, but shall simply be transferred to a higher class—class 6, group A?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The committee amendment transfers them to group A, class 6.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But your amendment, beginning in line 23, on page 51, proceeds to say that they shall not have any advantage of any longevity they have already experienced.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; because of the years of experience of teaching in lower classes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Now, I have in my mind a drawing teacher in the public schools of Washington who taught my eldest daughter, who taught my eldest son, who is teaching here now, and has been teaching for 18 years. Nobody ever taught drawing better than she, and this bill, while it promotes people of her class or her experience or her training to group A of class 6, cuts her off from all promotion due to her on account of longevity, whereas the other members of group A, class 6, are entitled to all increase of pay from longevity that may have accrued to them.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I am one of the men in the United States who has suffered from an old-fashioned education. I do not know as much about modern applied science as a 14-year-old boy ought to know. I think a teacher of drawing is more useful in a public school than a teacher of Latin. I think to train the hand and to train the eye as auxiliaries of the mind is of vast importance, a thing by the lack of which I, by the way, with very many other men, suffer.

I want the Senate to listen to the class of teachers they are. Manual-training teachers—they teach the boy to make a living by his hands and eyes after he leaves school; drawing teachers; teachers of music—music, which appeals to the ear and the soul; teachers of physical culture—that which keeps the body in perfect health.

The Senator from New Hampshire and his committee have done the justice of transferring these teachers to group A, class 6, where they ought to have been long ago.

Mr. President, I make the assertion, without any fear of intelligent contradiction, that it is very much easier to get an efficient teacher of Latin in a public school or of history or of English literature or of French or of German than it is to get an efficient teacher of drawing, free-hand or mechanical.

I make the further assertion that there is not a single pursuit in life, whether it be that of the lawyer or the electrical engineer—it makes no difference what—to the successful carrying out of which a knowledge of free-hand and mechanical drawing is not a very great aid. Even a lawyer finds it useful in a jury trial. I know that many men around here have suffered just as I have from a lack of training of the eye and the hand—training the head overmuch and leaving the eye and the hand and the ear untrained.

I hope the Senator from New Hampshire, in charge of the bill, can accept the amendment. I think he probably will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am pretty well persuaded that the amendment the Senator from Mississippi has offered is all right. I think the provision in the bill substantially covers it, because we provide that no teacher shall receive less salary than he would receive in the lower class, which naturally would put him up somewhat higher.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, here is the part of the amendment to which I object. It says:

Provided further, That the provisions contained in the acts approved May 26, 1908, and May 18, 1910, relative to the longevity placing of teachers in class 6, group A, for previous years of experience in teaching in accredited normal, high, and manual-training schools, shall not apply to any teacher now in the service of the public schools.

I offer a substitute for that, and the language which follows the words "group A," on line 23, of page 51, down to the word "class" in line 9, on page 52:

At the salary in class 6, group A, next higher than the salary said teachers are now receiving in classes 4 and 5: Provided further, That they shall hereafter receive their annual increase in salary as provided for class 6, group A, in the act of June 8, 1906.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi please send his amendment to the desk, that it may be stated?

The SECRETARY. On page 51 of the committee amendment, line 23, after the letter "A," strike out—

Provided further, That the provisions contained in the acts approved May 26, 1908, and May 18, 1910, relative to the longevity placing of teachers in class six, group A, for previous years of experience in teaching in accredited normal, high, and manual-training schools, shall not apply to any teacher now in the service of the public schools, or hereafter to be appointed, placed in said class 6, group A, by reason of this proviso; but no teacher so placed in class 6, group A, shall receive less salary than he would receive in the lower class—

at the salary in class 6, group A, next higher than the salary said teachers are now receiving in class 4 and 5: Provided further, That they shall hereafter receive their annual increase in salary as provided for class 6, group A, in the act of June 8, 1906.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, in order to keep the bill symmetrical, as at present constructed, that after the word "schools" and semicolon, in line 12, this language ought to be added:

And that teachers of these subjects hereafter shall be appointed and placed in the same manner as teachers of academic and scientific subjects.

I think the Senator from New Hampshire will accept the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. There can be no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi send his amendment to the desk, in order that it may be stated?

The SECRETARY. On page 52, at the end of line 12, insert the following:

And that teachers of these subjects hereafter shall be appointed and placed in the same manner as teachers of academic and scientific subjects.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to have placed in the RECORD a brief statement concerning the duties of these various teachers who are included in that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Department.	Number of teachers.	Additional amount required to place in class 6.	Remarks.
Drawing	28	$1,860	Free-hand drawing includes work in pencil, pen, and charcoal, modeling, painting, and art metal. It covers the subjects of representation, design—both decorative and constructive—and the history of art. The free-hand drawing course in constructive design is planned to cooperate with the shops and mechanical drawing room, so that objects designed in the drawing room are made in the woodworking, forge, and art-metal shops. Bowls, tables, chairs, and desks, wrought-iron hinges, escutcheons, and door knockers; copper and brass bowls, trays, candlesticks, paper knives, and silver jewelry are some of the objects designed and made. Stenciling and embroidery are completed in the drawing room. Mechanical drawing is applied mathematics in a very practical form. The course as planned here serves as an essential preparation for college work in higher mathematics, graphics, and mechanics, and also prepares students who do not go on to college to earn their living as patent draftsmen and patent searchers in patent attorney's offices, Navy and War Departments, Bureau of Standards, and drawing rooms of the Navy Yard. The course includes projection, orthographic and isometric; machine drawing; architectural and topographical drawing, and patent drawing.
Manual training	15	790	Woodworking includes wood turning, cabinet-making and pattern making. It teaches the use of tools, machinery, and materials. Students are taught to read working drawings and to interpret them. In wood turning, chucking, rechucking, face-plate work, polishing, and the turning of hardwoods are necessary steps in the course. Cabinetmaking covers the making and upholstering of furniture. The course in pattern making consists of exercises which emphasize each principle of the trade and bring to the knowledge of the student the physical properties of materials, such as the shrinkage of metals, etc. The course in pattern making includes a course in molding. From a technical point of view forging is an important art and furnishes a greater amount of manual training than any other of the mechanical arts. The course covers all forms of ironwork, such as drawn point, bent eye, right-angle bend, hook and staple, square and hexagonal nut, bolts, chains, flat and band welding, tongs, etc. The work in the machine shop focuses and completes the experience gained in the other departments of manual training, including forging, woodworking, mechanical and free-hand drawing—for example, the forging made in the forge shop is converted into the finished product in the machine shop. From free-hand drawing the ability is acquired to make the sketch from which a working drawing may be made in the mechanical drawing room. The work of machine shop involves the solution of problems and accurate calculations in laying off work, in setting up machines, which puts into practical use the student's knowledge of algebra, geometry, and trigonometry. The course covers work on the lathe, the shaper, universal grinding machine, drilling machine, milling machine, etc., through all the various exercises of making cylinders, tapering, rectangular block, mandrel, gear, etc.
Domestic science	5	$290	The teaching of domestic science includes the teaching of physics, bacteriology, and physiology: Physics— Study of air currents and heat applied to the management of stoves. Study of light applied to the lighting of houses. Study of gases; use of kerosene and gasoline. Weighing and measuring of food in terms of heat with the idea of planning meals so that the normal individual can have the kind and amount of food necessary for proper nourishment. Bacteriology— As a basis for lessons in preserving. Instructs in practical hygiene; ventilation; precautions against infection and as an application to the rules of health and right living. Physiology— Taught as a science. Applied to hygiene. Home nursing, care of patient in bed and bandaging, first aid, antidotes, care of sprains, broken bones, burns, sunstroke, drowning, etc. Preparation and serving of food.
Domestic art	7	380	The course in domestic art includes plain sewing, dressmaking, tailoring and millinery. It includes the study of textiles, such as cotton, silk, and wool; their source, growth, preparation for manufacture, varieties of material and adaptation. The hygiene of wearing apparel, the study of materials, suitability for use and income, economy of time in relation to buying and making are some of the values considered. The course of work is carefully designed to develop capacity for and interest in the proper management of the home. The course includes instruction in care and use of the sewing machine, practice in hand and machine work, drafting pattern, cutting and making. Exercises in basting, stitching, hemming, overcasting, etc. Millinery includes principles of hat construction, drafting, cutting, wiring and covering frames, designing of hats for different seasons. Embroidery.
Physical training	10	730	Man being a machine, an organism, and a thinking individual, the trained physical-culture teacher chooses exercises for the effects upon his three-fold nature. Physical— Hygienic or preventive. Corrective. Recreative. Mental— Impression. Repression. Expression. Moral— Inhibition. Exhibition. The exercise when rightly planned and executed has two values, esthetic and gymnastic.
Music	5	395
Kindergarten practice teachers.[1]	4	925
Assistants to directors of primary instruction.	3	50
Total	74	5,420

[1] Kindergarten normal teachers; observe number and amount; they jump from class 3 to class 6.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also, Mr. President, a very brief plea for the teachers of domestic science and domestic art, and a list of teachers who have recently left Washington high schools for better-paying positions in other schools in the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PLEA FOR TEACHERS OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND DOMESTIC ART.

"The teachers of domestic science and domestic art are women who have taught from 9 to 22 years in the system. They are long residents of the District, residing here with their families, so are able to serve at a less wage than strangers could. If they should leave, it would be impossible to replace them with equally good teachers at the same salary; besides, justice demands that some recognition of their faithful service be made. It is the personnel of the teaching corps, the teaching ability, and the character that must be paid for. They are, above all, teachers who come in contact with the children, must know child nature in order to discipline and mold the character of the child, which means a knowledge of psychology and pedagogy obtained only at colleges by the payment of large sums. Some of these teachers have taken courses at Columbia University in the summer vacation.

"That the McKinley School has served as a training school for New York and other places may be seen by the accompanying list, which shows that 14 teachers have left that school to better themselves financially, and their present salaries will show what other cities pay for industrial education. The highest salary attainable here is $1,350 for the special teachers, while a glance at the list will show that the former teachers now in other cities are getting from $2,000 to $2,750.

"The equipment, which is the finest in the United States, is practically valueless in the hands of the cheap teacher, without considering the moral effect of the cheap teacher on the future citizen, as well as the effect on the culture of the child.

"Cooking and sewing are not the subjects taught, but domestic science and domestic art. Domestic science includes the chemistry of foods, the proper physiological combination of foods in menus, and the economics of housekeeping. Domestic art has to do with drafting of patterns, the proper combinations of colors, the application of the pupil's own designs to embroidery, and the study of textiles.

"All of this required special preparation in special schools, which these teachers have all had at great expenditure of money and energy on their part. Besides the usual academic education the teachers of domestic science must have studied pedagogy, psychology, chemistry, physics, bacteriology, botany, and physiology, such as only can be obtained in college courses.

"These teachers, in addition to their regular classes, have the same duties as the academic teachers; that is, they have charge of section rooms and are held responsible for the discipline of the school.

"Any discrimination against this class will handicap this part of the industrial education of the McKinley and Armstrong Manual Training Schools. We hear so much of the home makers these days. Shall they have cheaper teaching than the boys? While some of these girls go into business, the majority of them do not, since this is a cultural school, not a trade school. The majority of these girls are sent here for the home training in addition to the academic, as they can get all the science and more than in any of the academic high schools, and the same languages except Latin and Greek.

[1] Teachers who have left the McKinley Manual-Training High School within the 10 years of its existence.
[2] About.
[3] Left position as teacher to attend college, has since graduated, and is receiving a salary higher than the majority of the teachers in the so-called special classes.
[4] Estimated.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 52, line 13, before the word "in," to strike out "sixty-one" and insert "fourteen," so as to make the clause read:

Teachers in class 5, 114 in all, at a minimum salary of $950 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 17, before the word "in," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "twenty-two," so as to make the clause read:

Teachers in class 4, 422 in all, at a minimum salary of $800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 23, before the word "in," to strike out "thirty-eight" and insert "forty," so as to make the clause read:

Teachers in class 2, 340 in all, at a minimum salary of $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 24, before the word "in," to strike out "sixty-six" and insert "sixty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

Teachers in class 1, 68 in all, at a minimum salary of $500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine," so as to make the clause read:

Special beginning teacher in the normal school, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-seven thousand two hundred and fifty" and insert "seventy-three thousand one hundred," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for teachers, $1,373,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 5, to insert:

No class in any year of any of the high schools at any time shall consist of less than 10 pupils: Provided, That the subjects usually considered as belonging to business or manual training high schools be taught only in the business or manual training high schools already established for the purpose, and that any such subjects now taught in any academic high school be abandoned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to move to strike out the words—

Provided, That the subjects usually considered as belonging to business or manual training high schools be taught only in the business or manual training high schools already established for the purpose, and that any such subjects now taught in any academic high school be abandoned.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and especially that of the Senator from New Hampshire, to my reason for making the motion. This proviso is that these several subject of manual training—stenography, typewriting, and all that sort of thing—shall not be taught in any academic high school, and if taught there now shall be abandoned and shall be taught only in the business or manual training high school.

That would do very well for the northwest, because there the people have both accessible to the pupils, but a boy or girl who wants to study stenography or typewriting or take up manual training, who lives in the east and northeast, has to go away out to the other end of town. The consequence is that in the Eastern High School they started some classes, and have had them going on right well.

I have no objection to that part of the amendment which says that no class in any of the high schools at any time shall consist of less than 10 pupils, but if it be found that a class of over 10 pupils in stenography or typewriting exists in the Eastern High School, it should be continued, and the boys and girls should not be compelled to go a couple of miles to continue the training they have already begun. I think it ought to be continued and that by this provision we ought not to strike it down.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I can bear witness to the fact the Senator from Mississippi has stated. We have in the Eastern High School, which is only a few squares from where I have lived, a small class in typewriting and stenography. It would be very inconvenient for those living in that part of the town to go to the northwest, where the industrial schools are, and if the proviso which the Senator from Mississippi seeks to strike out is left in the bill it will have the effect of eliminating that small class in typewriting and stenography in the Eastern High School.

I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about the fact that it will affect that part of the population of Washington which is not its wealthiest and not the best able to take care of itself.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we will come to an agreement on this amendment after I have made a brief statement.

What confronted the committee, and which I looked into personally, is the fact that there is an apparent disposition to crowd manual-training teaching into all our academic high schools; there is a purpose, apparently, to do that; and I think it is a mistaken purposes, if it is to be engaged in in a broad way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will change the amendment and just say that the above proviso shall not apply to the Eastern High School.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I am going further than that. I am going to agree with the Senator.

I deprecate that for the reason that I think we ought to confine our manual training largely to the schools for that purpose, and I look with some degree of hesitancy and alarm, perhaps, to incorporating these special studies into our academic high schools.

But I know the situation in the eastern part of the city, and I have the assurance from the superintendent of schools that if this proviso goes out—and I do not object to it going out—he will take up the subject and give it very careful investigation. I therefore agree to the amendment the Senator from Mississippi proposes to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 53, it is proposed to strike out, beginning in line 7, the proviso in the amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 111, after line 8, to insert:

For pay of troops, other than Government employees, to be disbursed under the authority and direction of the commanding general, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, after line 18, to insert:

KLINGLE VALLEY PARK AND HIGHWAY.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire for a park, by purchase or condemnation, the land that may be necessary to preserve the Klingle Road Valley, comprising 28½ acres, as shown on plans filed in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, at an expense not exceeding $250,000, and for that purpose the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated. If said commissioners shall be unable to purchase said land at a price deemed by them to be reasonable, and not exceeding the sum of $250,000, then they shall proceed to acquire said land in the manner prescribed for providing a site for an addition to the Government Printing Office in so much of the act approved July 1, 1898, as is set forth on pages 648 and 649 of Volume XXX of the Statutes at Large, and for the purposes of said acquisition the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have and exercise all powers conferred upon the Public Printer in said act.

For the improvement of Klingle Valley Park, including the employment of personal services in preparing the plans therefor, and for all purposes in connection with said improvement, $40,000.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I call attention to the proposed amendment of the committee, commencing with line 19, on page 113, and extending down to line 11 on page 118, and I make the point of order that it is general legislation. I do so not only because I think it is improper legislation to carry into an appropriation bill, but for the further reason that I am informed that there is no crying need or demand for this land at the present time and that the amount appropriated is in excess of its real value.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hardly agree with the Senator from California as to the amount appropriated being in excess of the real value of the land, but the point of order is doubtless well taken, and it will not be controverted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WORKS. The amendment extends to line 11 on page 118.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is raised, as the Chair understands, to the amendment ending on page 114, line 19.

Mr. WORKS. No; the point of order was on the amendment down to line 11, on page 118.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That portion of the bill has not yet been read.

Mr. WORKS. No; none of it has yet been read. I simply call attention to it, and make the point of order. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wanted to say something about it, I believe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair that there are various provisions in that portion of the bill. The Chair has not looked at the bill closely, but looking at the first provision there seems to be no doubt that it is obnoxious to the rule. In relation, however, to Rock Creek Park, and so forth, the Chair can not tell until he has read the provision whether or not it is in order.

Mr. WORKS. It may be read, and then it can be determined whether or not the point of order is well taken.

The SECRETARY. On page 114, after line 19, the Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment:

ROCK CREEK DRIVE AND LOVERS' LANE.

For grading and improving Rock Creek Drive and Lovers' Lane, between Massachusetts Avenue and R Street NW., $9,500.

Mr. WORKS. That certainly is not within the point I made, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair thinks that is in order.

Mr. WORKS. Let the point of order be limited, then, to the amendment ending on line 19, page 114.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment down to line 19, on page 114, the point of order is sustained.

The question now is on the amendment, which has been stated, inserting the provision for Rock Creek Drive, and so forth, from line 20 to line 23, inclusive, on page 114.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 114, after line 23, to insert:

Under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to extend Rock Creek Drive NW., from Massachusetts Avenue southerly to Montrose Park, and to condemn any private interest in the land in Lovers' Lane lying between land taxed as parcels thirty-nine-ten and thirty-nine-eleven, and Montrose Park from T Street southerly to R Street NW., as shown on plans filed in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned as provided for herein plus the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

There is hereby appropriated entirely out of the revenues of the District of Columbia the sum of $15,000 to pay the cost and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, the amounts assessed as benefits, when collected, to be repaid to the District of Columbia to the credit of the revenues of said District: Provided further, That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, is hereby directed to transfer to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for highway purposes so much of Montrose Park as they may deem necessary for the connecting highway herein authorized.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move an amendment to the committee amendment. In line 17, on page 115, I move to strike out the words "the sum of $15,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "a sum sufficient."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 115, line 17, after the name "Columbia," it is proposed to strike out the words "the sum of $15,000" and to insert "a sum sufficient."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 116, after line 2, to insert:

FORT DAVIS AND FORT DUPONT PARKS, ETC.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to prepare a highway plan to change the location and width of Alabama Avenue SE., between Pennsylvania Avenue and Hillside Road, and to make such changes in the location of intersecting streets as may be necessary to provide proper connection with the new location of Alabama Avenue: Provided further, That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to preserve the sites of Fort Davis and Fort Dupont for park purposes, and to provide a connecting highway between these sites by widening Alabama Avenue to 150 feet, comprising in all approximately 41.25 acres of land, as shown on plans filed in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

There is hereby appropriated an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of said condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages: Provided, however, That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for and in respect of the land to be taken in the condemnation proceedings herein authorized plus the costs and expenses of the proceedings, not less than one-third and all in excess of $21,334 shall be assessed by the jury as benefits, which when collected shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

Mr. GALLINGER. For that amendment I offer a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the amendment of the committee, on page 116, lines 5 to 25, inclusive, and on page 117, lines 1 to 11, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to prepare a highway plan to change the location and width of Alabama Avenue SE., between Pennsylvania Avenue and Hillside Road, and to make such changes in the location of intersecting streets as may be necessary to provide a proper connection with the new location of Alabama Avenue; and they are further authorized and directed to acquire for a park, by purchase or condemnation, the land that may be necessary to preserve the sites of Fort Davis and Fort Dupont for park purposes, and to provide a connecting highway between these sites by widening Alabama Avenue to 150 feet, comprising in all approximately 41.25 acres of land, as shown on plans filed in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, at an expense not exceeding $32,000, and for that purpose the sum of $32,000 is hereby appropriated. If said commissioners shall be unable to purchase said land at a price deemed by them to be reasonable, and not exceeding the sum of $32,000, then they shall proceed to acquire said land in the manner prescribed for providing a site for an addition to the Government Printing Office in so much of the act approved July 1, 1898, as is set forth on pages 648 and 649 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large, and for the purposes of said acquisition the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have and exercise all powers conferred upon the Public Printer in said act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 117, after line 11, to insert:

MOUNT HAMILTON PARK.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by condemnation, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, for park purposes, the tract of land situated at and in the vicinity of Mount Hamilton, or Mulliken Hill, lying east of Bladensburg Road, north of M Street east, west of Twenty-sixth Street east, and south of the District of Columbia school property and Q Street east, containing approximately 81 acres, as shown on plat on file in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia. There is hereby appropriated an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of said condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages: Provided, however, That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for and in respect of the land to be taken in the condemnation proceedings herein authorized, plus the costs and expenses of the proceedings, not less than one-third and all in excess of $60,000, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits, which when collected shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a substitute for that amendment, to come in after the heading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the amendment of the committee on page 117, lines 13 to 25, inclusive, and on page 118, lines 1 to 11, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire for a park, by purchase or condemnation, the tract of land situated at and in the vicinity of Mount Hamilton, or Mulliken Hill, lying east of Bladensburg Road, north of M Street east, west of Twenty-sixth Street east, and south of the District of Columbia school property and Q Street east, containing approximately 81 acres, as shown on plat on file in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, at an expense not exceeding $90,000; and for that purpose the sum of $90,000 is hereby appropriated. If said commissioners shall be unable to purchase said land at a price deemed by them to be reasonable and not exceeding the sum of $90,000, then they shall proceed to acquire said land in the manner prescribed for providing a site for an addition to the Government Printing Office in so much of the act approved July 1, 1898, as is set forth on pages 648 and 649 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large; and for the purposes of said acquisition the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have and exercise all powers conferred upon the Public Printer in said act.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire what particular change is made by this proposed amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. The substantial change is this: Never in previous legislation have we assessed benefits when we established parks, but the bill provided for the assessment of benefits, while the substitute does not make such provision.

Mr. WORKS. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment evidently fall within the point of order that I made a little while back, that they provide general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question about it being a legislative provision in the mind of the Chair. Does the Senator make that point?

Mr. WORKS. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; it is a small matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Water department," on page 118, line 19, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; and in line 21, before the word "meter," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to make the clause read:

For revenue and inspection branch: Water registrar, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $2,400; clerks—1 at $1,700, 1 at $1,200, 2 at $1,000 each; index clerk, $1,400; 4 meter computers, at $1,000 each; chief inspector, $1,000; meter clerk, $1,000; tap clerk, $1,000; inspectors—8 at $900 each; 11 at $800 each; messenger, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "eight"; and in line 4, after the word "clerks," to strike out "one at $1,500; one at $1,350" and insert "two at $1,500 each," so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the distribution branch of the water department, on page 120, line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "six"; and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty-four thousand three hundred and thirty-five" and insert "eighty-six thousand and eighty-five," so as to read:

Chief inspector of valves, $1,600; in all, $86,085.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 19, before the word "motor," to strike out "two," so as to make the clause read:

For fuel, repairs to boilers, machinery, and pumping stations, pipe distribution to high and low service, material for high and low service, including public hydrants and fire plugs, and labor in repairing, replacing, raising, and lowering mains, laying new mains and connections, and erecting and repairing fire plugs, maintenance of motor trucks, horses, wagons, carts, and harness necessary for the proper execution of this work, and including a sum not exceeding $800 for the purchase and use of bicycles by inspectors of the water department, $37,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 122, line 17, after the word "laborers," to insert "drivers, hostlers," so as to make the clause read:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are further authorized to employ temporarily such laborers, skilled laborers, drivers, hostlers, and mechanics as may be required exclusively in connection with sewer, street, and road work, and street cleaning, or the construction and repair of buildings and bridges, or any general or special engineering or construction work, and to incur all necessary engineering and other expenses, exclusive of personal services, incidental to carrying on such work and necessary for the proper execution thereof, said laborers, skilled laborers, drivers, hostlers, and mechanics to be employed to perform such work as may not be required by law to be done under contract, and to pay for such services and expenses from the appropriations under which such services are rendered and expenses incurred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 124, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "thirteen," so as to read:

SEC. 4. The services of assistant engineers, draftsmen, levelers, rodmen, chainmen, and inspectors temporarily required in connection with water-department work authorized by appropriations may be employed exclusively to carry into effect said appropriations, and be paid therefrom, when specifically and in writing ordered by the Commissioners of the District, and the Commissioners of the District in their annual estimates shall report the number of such employees performing such services and their work and the sums paid to each: Provided, That the expenditures hereunder shall not exceed $13,000 during the fiscal year 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, at the top of page 126, to insert:

For mantle gas lamps of not less than 120 candlepower, $27 per lamp per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 24, after the word "shall," to insert "hereafter," so as to make the clause read:

For the rates named above it shall hereafter be the duty of each gas-light company and each electric-light company doing business in the District of Columbia to erect and maintain such street lamps as the Commissioners of said District may direct; and each such company shall furnish, install, and maintain all posts, lamps, lanterns, burners, wires, cable, conduits, gas pipes, street designations, and fixtures necessary for the respective lamps maintained by each of them, including lighting and extinguishing lamps, and repairing, painting, and cleaning.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, line 9, before the word "cost," to strike out "The" and insert "Hereafter the," so as to read:

Hereafter the cost of each lamp-post for incandescent electric lighting furnished by any lighting company under the above rates shall not exceed $15, except as hereinafter provided, which cost shall include only the lamp-post, the globe, the ornamental top, and the street-designation frame and signs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, line 24, before the word "maintained," to strike out "lamp" and insert "lamps," so as to make the clause read:

The cost of each lamp-post for gas lighting furnished by any lighting company under the above rates shall not exceed $15, except as hereinafter provided, which cost shall include only the lamp-post and the street-designation frame and signs. All other fixtures, parts, fittings, burners, lamps, pipes, and appurtenances necessary for the lamps maintained by said lighting company on said posts, including the cost of erection, shall not be included in said cost.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 12, to insert:

For each such lamp-post furnished by a lighting company by direction of the District Commissioners which shall cost in excess of $15 for gas or electric incandescent lamps, or which shall cost in excess of $50 for electric arc lamps, the company furnishing the same shall receive, in addition to the above rates, 11 per cent per annum on such additional or excess cost.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, line 20, before the word "Commissioners," to strike out "The" and insert "Hereafter the," so as to read:

Hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized, in their discretion, to purchase or construct from street-lighting appropriations made in this act posts, lanterns, street designations, and all necessary fixtures or appurtenances for any of the systems of lighting above named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 10, before the word "Commissioners," to strike out "The" and insert "Hereafter the," so as to read:

Hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are further authorized, in their discretion, to adopt other forms of electric street lighting than those named, in which event payments under appropriations made in this act shall be made for the lighting service rendered at not to exceed 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for current consumed, and, in addition thereto, 11 per cent per annum of the cost to the lighting company of furnishing and installing lamps, posts, street designations, fixtures, and the cable from lamps to the nearest point of current supply, and a fair sum for the cost of maintenance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 21, before the word "ordered," to strike out "When" and insert "Hereafter when," so as to make the clause read:

Hereafter when ordered to do so by the said commissioners, lighting companies shall move and readjust any lamps maintained by them at the following rates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, line 16, before the word "ordered," to strike out "When" and insert "Hereafter when," so as to make the clause read:

Hereafter when ordered by the commissioners to do so, lighting companies in the District of Columbia shall discontinue any public lamps maintained by them without further payment therefor, and shall remove from the streets, at their own expense, all posts, lanterns, and fixtures connected therewith.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, after line 21, to strike out the following section:

SEC. 9. No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for membership fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia in any society or association or for expenses of attendance of any person at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association, unless such fees, dues, or expenses are authorized to be paid by specific appropriations for such purposes or are provided for in express terms in some general appropriation.

And insert:

SEC. 8. No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for membership fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia in any society or association unless such fees or dues are authorized to be paid by specific appropriations for such purposes or are provided for in express terms in some general appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, line 13, to change the number of the section from 10 to 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, after line 21, to strike out:

SEC. 11. On and after July 1, 1912, fees collected by the District of Columbia shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts, as follows, namely, fees of superintendent of weights, measures, and markets; fees of surveyor's office; health department fees; pound fees; fees for railing permits; fees for building permits; fees for electrical permits; bathing-beach fees; fees from public-convenience stations; fees for tax certificates; fees for motor and horse-drawn vehicle tags; fees of the municipal court; and the surplus fees of the recorder of deeds and register of wills; together with the tuition of nonresident pupils in public schools, and the tax of one-half of 1 cent paid by any street or other railroad company for each passenger carried across the Highway Bridge; and the annual wheel tax on all automobiles or other motor vehicles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, after line 12, to insert:

SEC. 10. Hereafter the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds may transfer apparatus, appliances, equipments, and supplies of any kind, discontinued or permanently out of service, to such other branches of the service of the United States or District of Columbia whenever, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, in his judgment the interests of the Government service may require it. A detailed statement of all such transfers shall be submitted in the annual report to Congress of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. On behalf of the committee I have some amendments to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "two thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three thousand," and on page 6, in lines 9, 10, and 11, change the total so as to read "$122,122."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 25, strike out the words "one thousand eight hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two thousand," and on page 15, in lines 9 and 10, change the total so as to read "$186,540."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 3, insert the following:

For the purchase of metal or other suitable files for the records of the department of insurance, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after line 22, insert the following: "Northeast: Jackson Street, between Twentieth and Twenty-second Streets, grade and improve, $1,600; northwest: Chesapeake Street, Wisconsin Avenue to River Road, grade and improve, $3,000"; and in lines 23 and 24 change the total so as to read "$160,125."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 2, after the word "stables," insert the word "hire"; in line 3, after the word "horses," insert the word "hire"; and in line 8, after the word "operation," insert the words "and supervision."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with line 15, on page 39, strike out all down to and including the word "collected," in line 7, page 40, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Hereafter every street railway company in the District of Columbia shall keep its tracks and the spaces between and for a distance of 2 feet outside thereof at the crossings of the several streets which intersect their railroads at all times free from snow and ice, and shall not spill or deposit the same on either side of such crossings in such location and quantity as to impede or hinder traffic. And in the event of any street railway company failing and refusing to comply with this act, the necessary work may be done by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in their discretion, after notice to said company, the cost to be paid from the appropriation for cleaning snow and ice from streets, sidewalks, crosswalks, and gutters and collected from such street railway company in the manner provided for in section 5 of an act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, approved June 11, 1878, and shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for the fiscal year in which it is collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, line 10, after the word "the," insert the words "purchase and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, line 16, after the word "each," strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three"; and in lines 17 and 18 change the total so as to read $63,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, in line 16, strike out the words "six hundred and sixty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seven hundred and twenty"; in line 18, make the total so as to read $9,940; and on page 102, in lines 5, 6, and 7 change the total so as to read $72,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those are all the amendments I have to offer on behalf of the committee.

Mr. WORKS. I made the point of order against the substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire relating to Mount Hamilton Park, that it was general legislation. I now make the same point of order against the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the point of order covered both provisions, and both went out.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. I now offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars" in line 10, on page 39, insert:

Provided, That all laborers on street-cleaning work shall receive not less than $2 per day for time employed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is manifestly subject to a point of order, but I will not make it. I am quite willing that it shall go to conference.

Mr. WORKS. I understand that the laborers on the streets here are being paid less than those in any other city in the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are being paid very small wages. Let the amendment go in.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 39, line 9, I move to amend by striking out the words "two hundred and seventy-five" and inserting in lieu thereof "three hundred and twenty-five."

My reason for doing this is that with the rate of wages increased, of which I heartily approve, it will be necessary to have an additional appropriation for street-cleaning purposes, and to that end it is suggested that there ought to be $50,000 added.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, line 9, strike out the words "two hundred and seventy-five" and in lieu thereof insert "three hundred and twenty-five," so as to read "three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. GALLINGER. While I think the appropriation in the bill will prove to be sufficient, I have no objection to the amendment going in.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ST. GEORGE, UTAH.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to enter a motion similar to that entered by the Senator from Tennessee, to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 3716) for the erection of a public building at St. Georges, Utah, was passed on Saturday, and I ask that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request for the return of the bill is agreed to, and the motion to reconsider is entered for future action.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 20, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, help us to hallow Thy name by consecrating ourselves anew to all that is best in life, that with pure motives, high ideals, and noble endeavors we may do things worth while and prove ourselves worthy of the intellectual, moral, and spiritual gifts with which Thou hast so richly endowed us, and thus develop for ourselves in full and symmetrical proportions a character after the similitude of the Master's. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HOMESTEADS.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a tabulation of some of the homestead laws and bills which will be up for consideration before the House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain tabulated statements concerning the homestead laws. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The tabulations are as follows:

PUBLICITY IN CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGNS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House upon both sides are interested in the formal statement which is required to be filed by each individual candidate for Congress prior to his nomination and immediately following his nomination, prior to his election and subsequent to his election. I have conferred with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, and we have prepared a part of these forms. I ask leave now to insert in the RECORD a form of statement which may be made prior to a nomination, and one which may be made following the nomination of a candidate for Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, is that under the so-called campaign publicity bill?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The candidate has to file a statement before his nomination?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Would it not be well, if these forms meet the approval of the membership of the House, to have blanks printed for the purpose of furnishing them to Members?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, after getting the unanimous consent that I desire, I wish, in addition thereto, to have leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, so as to explain the statements which are required to be made, and to explain the law itself.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman intend to introduce a form blank upon which to make a report?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is very essential and ought to be done.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand from the gentleman's remarks that the proposed form will only be advisory, and not obligatory.

Mr. LLOYD. It will be advisory only.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The point I have in mind is that the convention in my district will be held on the 28th instant. I filed my statement on yesterday in the form of a general sworn statement. I, of course, would want some sort of a reserving clause if it were to be obligatory.

Mr. LLOYD. This is in no sense obligatory. It is only for the purpose of information.

The SPEAKER. The House will understand that all of this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has these forms printed in the RECORD, I suggest that the gentleman also, for the general convenience of both Members here and candidates outside, ask leave that there may be printed for the use of the Clerk of the House a sufficient number of copies of these forms to provide them to candidates.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman know that for some days a proposition has been underway to have certain members of the House Judiciary Committee prepare a proper blank or form for candidates for the House and for the Senate, and that it is further proposed that that form be printed, by order of the House, in sufficient numbers to supply all candidates for the House and Senate with blanks? That has been underway for some time, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he is aware of that fact?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I had a talk yesterday with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in reference to these forms. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and myself have been collaborating upon a form and have prepared the preliminary form, and practically the others, which I think will meet all of the requirements without question, and it would be a great convenience to Members if those forms could be furnished by the Clerk.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it has been the intention of some Members, myself among them, to do what we could to bring about the printing of a sufficient number of forms to supply all candidates for the House and Senate.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Missouri that the State law of New Jersey and the United States law conflict in one respect. A Member of Congress in New Jersey can appoint a committee of five, who expend all of the money that he has contributed. He makes a report upon that to the secretary of state, and all that the Member himself would swear to would be the amount of money turned over to his committee. For instance, when I was a candidate last fall, I appointed a committee of five to handle the funds that I gave them. When it came to making my statement to Congress I found that it was a very difficult matter to do, and I had to take the statement of the committee which I had appointed.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman would have to make two statements—one to Congress and one to the State of New Jersey.

Mr. BROWNING. Yes; but the two laws conflict. I do not expend the money.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to offer any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], but it occurs to me to suggest that this is a law which was passed by Congress, which prescribed what candidates in the primary and candidates who have been nominated for Congress shall do, both during the primary, at the primary, before the election to Congress, and after the election to Congress. It occurs to me to suggest that it is somewhat strange that a body of men who passed a law of this sort, for which I did not vote because I did not believe we had the power to enact any such law, and also because I thought the various States—I know mine has—have enacted a better law with reference to publicity of campaign funds than the one we have put upon the statute books here—it is strange, I say, that this body should have to have some one construe its own law. I rise to call attention to that fact, for it is a singular commentary upon the intelligence of a body of three hundred and ninety-odd Members, who have enacted the law, to say that we not only need a construction of that law, as to how we should operate under it, and what sort of statements we should make, but that we should have done for us that which is done for tyros in the practice of law in justice courts, namely, have a form book prescribed showing how we shall follow the law. Not only that, but we propose to encumber the Treasury of the United States with the expense of publishing and furnishing to each Member of this House, and to other candidates who do not happen to be Members, a blank form in which we are told how to comply with this law of the United States. We find ourselves now in a peculiar position. During the closing hours of last session, without due consideration, as I believe, we passed an amendment to the law respecting publicity of campaign funds, making it apply to primary elections, and it is now suggested that we do not know how to comply with that law, but must follow the suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Missouri as to how we shall comply with it. I have no objection to the information being given to the House or to the country, to those Members of the House who are prospective Members, or to those who are not Members of the House who are prospective candidates, as to how we shall construe the law and how we shall follow it.

But if we make a mistake, or rather if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] make a mistake in the construction of this law, and they are human, I apprehend, good lawyers as they are, accomplished and learned as they both are, if they have made a mistake and we plead in the courts, because we are subject to indictment if we do not follow this law, if we plead in the court as a justification for not complying with the law in the event the court should decide the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Missouri were mistaken as to the requirements of the law, we are to plead not guilty or to confess our guilt and plead in extenuation of it that the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Missouri thought that was the law. We are to plead that. The truth of the matter is we ought to be permitted to construe the law ourselves. We ought to be required to follow the law ourselves and we ought not to be required to have furnished by these two gentlemen the necessary forms and necessary blanks to comply with the law, and there is no reason, Mr. Speaker, why the House should be taxed with the cost of printing for the benefit of Members of the House who have voted for this law, either knowing what it was or not knowing what it was, or why we should tax the Treasury of the United States and Government of the United States for that which it is to be presumed every man who is a Member of Congress should have information on and be presumed that every man who is worthy to run for Congress and to be a candidate and to be elected or defeated for Congress ought to be able to construe for himself. Now, that is what I desire to suggest. It is a very remarkable suggestion that the House should print for the benefit of men who have been given by reason of their intelligence and their experience seats in this House, that after enacting a law that we need some one of the Members of the House to construe that law. Not only that, but we need somebody to put this matter in form like the drawing of a deed or the making of an affidavit for an attachment for young lawyers in order that we may not go astray therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will.

Mr. HILL. I understand in the last congressional election in Kansas it was made an essential that everybody who was a candidate and desired his name to go on the ticket as a candidate should, as a preliminary, pay $3,000 to somebody——

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HILL. In order to get their names on the ticket.

Mr. BARTLETT. You can expect anything from Kansas, you know.

Mr. HILL. I know it is a great progressive State and a good State and——

Mr. BARTLETT. But anything curious can come from Kansas.

Mr. HILL. I would like to know whether the manner in which the money is expended comes in any way to the knowledge of Congress under the law which we passed in the last Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think it does.

Mr. HILL. That is just what I think. The law is a farce.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have my request put again.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the request of the gentleman stated.

The SPEAKER. The request is to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain forms with the affidavits of money expended touching congressional nominations and elections and also to have the Clerk print enough of them to furnish to Members——

Mr. BARTLETT. To furnish to Members or candidates?

The SPEAKER. And other candidates. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object; I think it is a very foolish proposition.

EXCISE-TAX BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21214.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21214, the excise-tax bill, with Mr. MOON of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee will consider the bill under the five-minute rule for two hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I desire to offer to this bill. The amendment is to section 3, and I ask unanimous consent that I may offer it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that he may offer a committee amendment to section 3 of the bill at this time.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let the amendment be reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman what it is: On page 5, line 12, after the word "dollars," I desire to strike out the word "gross," so that it will read—

But persons having less than $4,500 income are not required to make such report.

That leaves out the word "gross."

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Striking out the word "gross" leaves this to mean $4,500 net income.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the committee that as this bill was originally offered it required all persons having a gross income of $4,500 to make a report of their income. After further consideration we have concluded that that might work a hardship; that there might be many persons who had an income of only $1,000 or $2,000 net income whose gross income would be as much as $4,500 or above. And in order not to force those people to make a report and annoy them with making a report, we propose to strike out the word "gross" and let it read simply "$4,500 income," which means net income, because net income is referred to in the other paragraphs of the bill and in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it would be net income?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it would.

Mr. MANN. I do not see the difference between "gross income" and "income." If the gentleman wants to make it "net income," would it not be safer to do that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the word "net" going in before the word "income," but as all the balance of the bill refers to net income, I presume the court would accept it in that way. If there is any doubt, I would ask to insert the word "net" instead of "gross," so as to make it read "net" instead of "gross."

Mr. BARTLETT. Is debate allowed on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the amendment?

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RAUCH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 11824. An act to amend section 113 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. ROOT of New York and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia to fill the vacancies in the Senate membership of the joint commission, provided under the act of April 28, 1904, for extension and completion of the Capitol Building, occasioned by the death of Mr. Alger of Michigan and Mr. Gorman of Maryland.

THE EXCISE-TAX BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person, firm, or copartnership residing in the United States, any Territory thereof, or in Alaska or the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such person equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by such person from all sources during each year; or, if a nonresident, such nonresident person shall likewise be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such person equivalent to 1 per cent upon the amount of net income over and above $5,000 received by such person from business transacted and capital invested within the United States and its Territories, Alaska, and the District of Columbia during each year. The term "business," as herein used, is and shall be held to embrace everything about which a person can be employed, and all activities which occupy the time, attention, and labor of persons for the purpose of a livelihood or profit. The word "person" wherever used in this act shall be held to include natural persons or individuals and firms or copartnerships.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

I shall not discuss our constitutional power to enact this bill. I have listened to the discussion, which in the main has been able, on both sides of that legal question; and even if I were competent to discuss it as intelligently, perchance, as it has been discussed, there is no time in five minutes to discuss it.

I intend to be purely practical in my discussion of this bill, without regard to whether it is constitutional or not.

There are $124,000,000 in the general fund in the Treasury. We had last year $47,000,000 of surplus revenue under existing law. We have advanced for the construction of the Panama Canal from the general fund in the Treasury, over and above what the Government has been reimbursed, in round numbers $126,000,000. This amount is reimbursable.

I have no doubt that the surplus at the close of this fiscal year will be more than it was at the close of the last fiscal year. I believe it will be over $50,000,000. Now, under existing law, saying nothing about reimbursement for moneys advanced for the Panama Canal, the revenues are ample to care for the Government; and, Gen. SHERWOOD, if the pension bill that bears your name should be enacted into law, the Government revenues would be large enough, without one additional dollar of taxation, to pay the additional expense caused by the enactment of that pension bill. [Applause.]

Now, here we are in the session preceding the presidential election. My friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the leader upon that side of the House, fires in his revenue bills, although he has no more idea of their being enacted than he has that he will repose in Abraham's bosom when he crosses over to the other side. [Laughter.] They are all pure leather and prunella. When I have said that I have said all I desire to say upon this subject. Yet, under the able leadership of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], they will continue to fire in these bills, continue to talk about taxation, continue to weep crocodile tears for the poor oppressed people; when the agitation that they make in seeking to gain this political capital brings, through fear and apprehension in the minds of great multitudes of people, whatever of distress now rests upon the country. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after line 13, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the incomes of persons who have retired from or are not engaged in active business, and to married women who have separate incomes from property in their own names, under the laws of any State of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to reach those larger incomes which do no one any good except the recipients, and which are not reached by the bill as it is.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated yesterday, in answer to a question, that the provisions of this bill would not reach the incomes of men who had retired from or were not engaged in active business.

It is well known to everyone that the large incomes of the country are received by men who are to-day idle and who are known throughout the country, in the parlance of the present, as the idle rich. This bill will not reach the income of any one of these persons. I should like to see the incomes of Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller, and of the other great retired captains of industry, pay something under the provisions of this law. Without the amendment I have offered they will not be required to pay one cent.

I am also anxious to reach that other large class who have enormous incomes, the women of the country with colossal fortunes who marry foreign counts and live abroad. The provisions of this act would not reach them without this amendment. With this amendment, every countess living on the Continent of Europe or anywhere else, having property in the United States from which she receives an income, would have to pay something for the maintenance of the Government from which she has expatriated herself. Without this amendment these larger fortunes of this country would not pay a cent of tax under the provisions of this bill. With this amendment the incomes that ought to be reached will be reached.

But it is answered that this provision is in violation of the Constitution as laid down in the Pollock case. Well, we are appealing to the Supreme Court of the United States to reestablish an income tax, and it is just as well to take this provision up to the court with the question the bill raises as it is. We are only starting a lawsuit in any event, and we may as well include in that suit something that will be worth the trial. [Applause.] This provision will make it worth while to have passed this law and to have taken it to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered makes the idle man or the idle woman with a large income contribute to the support of the Government, and will in some measure relieve the active man and the active woman, with active capital, engaged in active business. This bill as it now stands requires the payment of a tax for the privilege of being active in business. It puts a premium on retiring from business, on not engaging in business, on taking capital out of business, on taking enterprise and industry out of the activities of the country.

I have always been a nationalist or a federalist and therefore have believed in an income tax properly enacted.

There has been no one step taken by our Democratic brethren in recent years that shows so conclusively that they have abandoned the idea that this is not a sovereign nation as the step they have taken to permit the Federal Government to extend its arm into the homes and business enterprises of every citizen of the Union who is in business, when his income exceeds the sum of $5,000 a year. Alexander Hamilton never pleaded for a nationalism that was greater and stronger than that. Thomas Jefferson would not have applauded the purposes of this bill. Alexander Hamilton, if he were here, would applaud this bill with the amendment I have offered. He believed always that this was a nation spelled with a capital N, and if this bill should ever become a law, if it includes the amendment I have offered, will enable the Federal Government to exercise the authority of its taxing powers over all property, active and idle as well, and make this tax bill really worth the passage. [Appause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself to the point of order which I now make. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment which would bring this bill into the category of an income-tax bill, and instead of accomplishing the result he says he desires, if the Supreme Court of the United States maintained the decision in the Pollock case, it would declare the bill unconstitutional.

Of course, I hope and believe that if the question is ever presented to the Supreme Court of the United States again it will reverse the Pollock case and hold that a direct income tax is constitutional. [Applause.]

But I do not want to complicate this bill. We are writing this bill for the purpose of raising revenue, and when the gentleman states that I stated yesterday that this bill would not reach the vast wealth of men like Mr. Carnegie, it simply means that the gentleman was not on the floor when I made my speech, because I distinctly said that it would reach men of that class.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at present. I stated that the bill would not reach the idle holder of idle wealth, but that there would be very few men who would be exempt under this bill, and that men like Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Astor were as much engaged in business as the men who are renting office buildings or lending money in the pawnbroker's shop.

Now, the point of order I desire to make is this: This bill seeks to levy an excise tax. Under its terms it does not attempt to levy a tax on incomes, it attempts to levy a tax on the right to do business, and measures the amount of the tax by the net income of the person taxed. But the tax is not on the income or the property; it is strictly on the right to do business.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas seeks to levy a tax on certain incomes, not on the right of the person to do business, but on the incomes they derive from the property, and under the rules of this House I contend that that amendment is not germane to the subject matter of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to levy a tax on incomes. To say that that tax shall be levied upon a man engaged in doing business is simply defining one phase of the bill. It is quite logical to add to that a provision levying a tax upon the incomes of those not engaged in business. The rules of this House make no distinction between an excise tax and an income tax. That is a matter that has been passed upon by the court, and that is for the court, but we are here passing a law under the rules of this House providing for an income tax, if we are doing anything. The provisions of this bill, as they stand, levy that tax upon the man and woman who are engaged in business, and the amendment I have offered only adds to that number the men and women who are not engaged in active business.

Is there anything incompatible in that amendment with the provisions of the bill as it stands? Is the idea of an income tax on activity so abhorrent to an income tax on inactivity that the Chair would hold that an income tax on the idle man could not be included in the provisions of the same bill with the tax on the income of the active man?

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is it not very apparent that Mr. Carnegie, whose holdings in the United States Steel Trust are supposed to be almost entirely in bonds, would pay an income upon the capital invested within the United States as set forth on page 2, line 5, of the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is one of the propositions that would go to the Supreme Court. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio, and if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama, that I will change this from a proviso to a separate section. Therefore, if when the lawsuit reaches the court, which it certainly will if this bill should ever become a law, if the court should hold that this separate section was unconstitutional, it would still leave the tax on the activity of the country, while it would relieve the inactivity of the country from taxation.

Mr. COVINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does not the gentleman know that if his amendment is written into the bill it plainly will destroy the validity of it in the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all; we are going to the Supreme Court of the United States anyhow. The gentleman does not indulge the hope that this bill, if it becomes a law, will not be a subject of litigation?

Mr. COVINGTON. No; but we indulge in the hope that amendments will not be offered purely for buncombe and which, if adopted, would have the effect not of perfecting but of destroying the purpose of the bill. That seems to be the purpose of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take it that the gentleman is quite familiar with buncombe legislation. He has participated in Democratic caucuses that have brought out one buncombe bill after another, and he knows what buncombe is. [Applause and laughter on Republican side.] This amendment is offered for the purpose of reaching that large wealth in this country which is exempted under the provisions of the bill under consideration.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, it certainly does not require any prescience to tell me that I would not have to go to a Democratic caucus to find buncombe when we still have left in this House a few gentlemen from the State of Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will not have to come to Kansas for his buncombe. He will find some in Maryland and some in Alabama, and all he wants of it in a Democratic caucus. I have stated that if there were any fear that in the lawsuit which will be brought as the result of this bill, if it should become a law, the court should find the provisions of the gentleman's bill constitutional and this proviso which I offer unconstitutional I shall be very glad to put it in the form of a separate section, so that that section could be declared unconstitutional and thus leave the remainder of the bill as written by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a separate section would be any more in order than the amendment offered here. I would like to have the Chair rule upon whether the matter is germane or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill provides for a special excise tax with respect to doing business by persons and copartnerships. This is strictly an excise tax. It is not an income tax. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas provides that the provisions of the act shall apply to incomes of persons who retire from or are not engaged in active business, and to married women who have separate incomes from property in their own names under the laws of the several States. It is very obvious that the amendment seeks to tax incomes, while the bill is not on the subject of incomes, but levies an excise tax on the privilege of carrying on business. The amendment being totally foreign to the subject matter of the bill, it is out of order, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is sustained.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by striking out the words "all sources" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said business."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to a proposition which makes this law as certainly unconstitutional as would the amendment which was offered by my colleague [Mr. CAMPBELL], should it be adopted. In order to arrive at once at what I wish to say, allow me to read from the corporation-tax case, what the court in its opinion said upon these words. The court said:

It is true that in the Spreckels case (192 U. S., supra), the excise tax, for the privilege of doing business, was based upon the business assets in use by the company, but this was because of the express terms of the statute which thus limited the measure of the excise. The statute now under consideration bears internal evidence that its draftsman had in mind language used in the opinion in the Spreckels case, and the measure of taxation, the income from all sources, was doubtless inserted to prevent the limitation of the measurement of the tax to the income from business assets alone.

It is evident from the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the others who have talked upon that side of this proposition, that they expect that the same measurement of this tax which was applied by the Supreme Court to the measurement of a corporation income can be applied to the measurement of an individual's income; and I assert that position overlooks the fundamental proposition in the corporation-tax case, namely that the decision rests on the right to tax the use of a corporate franchise in business. I know gentlemen quote it here as though it had rested on the proposition of taxing business alone, but they do not notice that in every instance, where the court used this language it emphasizes the fact that the thing taxed is the privilege of the corporation to do business as a corporation. This is important upon the question of the measure of the tax.

It was held that the tax on a corporation might include all its income from every source, including income from property which, considered alone and unconnected with the business, would not be taxable, but the court did not hold, and never will hold, that such a rule could be applied to individuals. The court rested this ruling squarely on the very fact that all the property of a corporation must be necessarily related to and connected with its business. The Government, in the brief on this case said:

Besides, the property held by a corporation, whether actively employed in its principal business or not, does serve as an aid to that business, adding to its financial strength and credit.

When the court came to pass on that question, in the opinion it used this language:

In the case at bar we have already discussed the limitations which the Constitution imposed upon the right to levy excise taxes, and it could not be said, even if the principles of the fourteenth amendment were applicable to the present case, that there is no substantial difference between the carrying on of business by the corporation taxed and the same business when conducted by a private firm or individual. The thing taxed is not the mere dealing in merchandise, in which the actual transactions may be the same, whether conducted by individuals or corporations, but the tax is laid upon the privileges which exist in conducting business with the advantages which inhere in the corporate capacity of those taxed, and which are not enjoyed by private firms or individuals. These advantages are obvious and have led to the formation of such companies in nearly all branches of trade. * * *

It is this distinctive privilege which is the subject of taxation, not the mere buying or selling or handling of goods, which may be the same, whether done by corporations or individuals.

Then on this very question the court further said:

It is contended that the measurement of the tax by the net income of the corporation or the company received by it from all sources was not only unequal, but so arbitrary and baseless as to fall outside the authority of the taxing power. But is this so? Conceding the power of Congress to tax the business activities of private corporations, including, as in this case, the privilege of carrying on business in a corporate capacity, the tax must be measured by some standard, and none can be chosen which will operate with absolute justice and equality on all corporations.

Some corporations do a large business upon a small amount of capital; others with a small business may have a large capital.

The tax upon the amount of business done must operate as unequally as a measure of excise as it is alleged the measure of income from all sources does.

Now, again:

Nor can it be justly said that investments have no real relation to the business transaction by a corporation. The possession of large assets is a business advantage of great value; it may give credit which will result in more economical business methods; it may give a standing which shall facilitate purchases; it may enable the corporation to enlarge the field of its activities and in many ways give it business standing and prestige.

So here in the very language of this bill, in the language of the corporation case, lies a provision which under the authority of the first case that was passed upon by the Supreme Court, under the safety-appliance act, under the decision of the court in the Western Union against Kansas, which I was so unfortunate as to be counsel for the State in this case, if for none of the broader constitutional reasons which have been urged against it here should succeed, will undoubtedly go down when the court comes to pass upon this language.

So this bill incorporates in its provision a measure of taxation which, under the corporation-tax cases, is clearly unconstitutional and can not be upheld. Broadening the provisions of the corporation-tax law to include all individual incomes brings the law within the rule declared in the Pollock case and annuls it in its entirety.

In the first employers' liability case (207 U. S., 463) Congress used language which could be construed to include intrastate as well as interstate commerce, and intrastate commerce not being with the regulative power of Congress the entire law was declared unconstitutional. Again, in Western Union against Kansas (216 U. S., 1)—a case in which I was unfortunate enough to be on the wrong side as counsel—the court held that a State law attempting to tax all the capital stock of a foreign corporation was unconstitutional as an unlawful restriction on interstate commerce.

As this bill, boldly and unequivocally attempts to measure a tax by including in its provisions sources of incomes not within the power of Congress to tax constitutionally, I believe it will be stricken down by the courts as a whole. If the amendment is adopted, the bill might be constitutional as to the incomes left within its provisions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, because it seeks to narrow the scope and application of this bill. I do not wish to see that done. Notwithstanding the fact that this measure originated on the other side of the House, and notwithstanding the fact that I am a protectionist Republican, I intend to vote for the bill just as it was reported by the committee. [Applause.]

Nearly 20 years ago I participated in an intercollegiate debate upon this question, and I was on the affirmative side. In preparing for that debate I gave the question as thorough a consideration as I was then capable of giving to it, and my investigation thoroughly convinced me of the wisdom and justice of this method of raising revenue. [Applause.] I still entertain the same opinion. I regret to take a position which, I assume, will be contrary to that of a majority of my party colleagues here, but I can not conscientiously, merely for the sake of party expediency, abandon the convictions of almost half a lifetime. [Applause.]

I had intended to participate in the general discussion of the bill, but the condition of my voice would not permit it, and for the same reason it must be evident to you that I can not discuss it further now. I wish to take advantage of the privilege which has been accorded of extending my remarks in the RECORD, in order to give my reasons for supporting the bill. I have risen now to make this brief explanation in order that my party colleagues may understand why I cast my vote for the bill [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think that if Congress had entertained the same opinion as to its taxing power which the gentleman from Kansas has expressed, neither the excise act of 1898 nor the corporation-tax act of 1909 would have been considered or passed. The language of the corporation-tax act is perfectly plain. It was sustained in every way by the court decisions relative to the method of measuring that tax. There can be no controversy in the mind of any gentleman, who will take the pains to even glance carefully at this act and at the Flint decision construing it, as to the meaning. This decision, commenting upon the objections made to the act, in which it undertakes to measure the corporation tax by the income derived from all sources, says:

> There is no rule which permits a court to say that the measure of its tax for the privilege of doing business, where income from property is the basis, must be limited to that derived from property which may be strictly said to be actively used in the business. Departures from that rule sustained in this court are not wanting.

Then a number of citations are given containing references to other decisions on similar lines. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt in the mind of any gentleman who favors an excise tax on business such as this bill proposes to lay, or in the mind of any gentleman who would have supported the corporation-tax act of 1909, as to what this means or as to what the courts would say it means.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment merely for the purpose of calling attention of the author of the bill to what seems to me to be absolutely certain to destroy the law in the Supreme Court. I want the gentlemen who start this lawsuit to put it up to the Supreme Court in the way they desire, and I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is said that imitation is the most sincere form of flattery, and therefore the Republican Party may properly feel flattered that the Democracy has in this bill attempted to imitate the Republican corporation tax. [Applause on the Republican side.] Most imitations, however, lack many of the virtues of the original; some lack all of them. This particular imitation is of the latter class.

I am opposed to this legislation; first, because while it professes to imitate a wise and constitutional measure it is neither wise nor constitutional.

There are times and conditions when, under a Government like ours, the legislative branch of the Government is justified in enacting legislation containing propositions which, at another time and in different form, have met the disapproval of a majority of the court of last resort, but there is no condition existing at this time justifying the launching on the legislative sea of this crude proposal which, under the name of an excise tax, involves all the problems of an income tax without having its virtues.

An amendment to the Federal Constitution, providing for an income tax, is now before the country awaiting the ratification of the States. Thirty States have already ratified it, requiring the approval of only six more. That approval can be had within a year. Should a sufficient number of States ratify the amendment, an evenly balanced bill could be brought in instead of this measure which, its proponents admit, would tax only the active and leave untaxed the idle wealth of the country. In this condition of affairs, with no present need of more revenue, there is no justification for this slipshod, halting, and inadequate attempt at an inequitable income tax under the guise of an excise tax.

I am further opposed to the measure, because it is brought forward on the ridiculous claim that it would raise sixty millions of revenue. If I were to vote for it and it finally ran the gantlet of the Supreme Court, I would be subject to the criticism that I had voted for a measure with the expectation that it would fill a sixty-million gap in the revenues when, in fact, it would raise only fifteen or twenty millions.

I am further opposed to the bill, because it is presented as a stop gap for a threatened breach in our tariff walls made by the loss of $53,000,000 if the bill putting sugar on the free list should pass. It can not minimize the loss or delay the destruction to the interests or industries of the American people which the removal of the tariff on sugar would bring, but is presented as the excuse for and complement of that measure of property confiscation and treaty repudiation. Therefore I can not support it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That in computing incomes the necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on any business, not including personal, living, or family expenses, shall be deducted, and also all interest paid within the year by such person on existing indebtedness; and all national, State, county, school, and municipal taxes, not including those assessed against local benefits, paid within the year shall be deducted from the gains, profits, or income of the person who has actually paid the same, whether such person be owner, tenant, or mortgagor; also losses actually sustained during the year incurred in trade or arising from fires, storms, or shipwrecks, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and debts ascertained to be worthless: Provided, That no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate: Provided further, That only one deduction of $5,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of all the members of any family composed of one or both parents and one or more minor children or husband and wife; that guardians shall be allowed to make a deduction in favor of each and every ward, except that in case where two or more wards are comprised in one family and have joint property interests the aggregate deduction in their favor shall not exceed $5,000: And provided further, That in cases where the salary or other compensation paid to any person in the employment or service of the United States shall not exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum, or shall be by fees or uncertain or irregular in the amount or in the time during which the same shall have accrued or been earned, such salary or other compensation shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of the person to whom the same shall have been paid, and shall include that portion of any income or salary upon which a tax has not been paid by the employer, fiduciary, or other person, where the employer, fiduciary, or other person is required by law to pay on the excess over $5,000: And provided further, That in computing the income of any person there shall not be included the amount received from any corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company as dividends upon the stock of such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, if the special excise tax of 1 per cent now imposed by law has been paid by such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company: And provided further, That in computing the income of any person there shall not be included the amount received from any firm or copartnership if the special excise tax of 1 per cent imposed by this act has been paid by such firm or copartnership.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 3, by striking out the language at the top of the page, beginning in line 1, as follows:

> Provided, That no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate.

I confess I do not quite understand what would constitute the income, but, apparently, from the reading of this bill, if a man was a member of the Building & Loan Association and borrowed money from that association with which to build a home, and the amount borrowed, together with the rest of his income, exceeded $5,000, he would be compelled to pay any excess on the tax over $5,000, because no deduction can be made under the terms of the bill for the money expended by him for the construction of his home. Of course, the same would apply to the borrowing of money from any other source. We have a very large membership in the building and loan associations throughout the United States, and heretofore had aimed to except them from the provisions of any tax that we might levy, but here is a proposition that says if a man borrows money to build a home for himself he will have to pay an excise tax for conducting business.

That is illustrative of the general features of the bill—a bill to tax industry. One the one hand, our Democratic friends are proposing to remove the protection which American industries enjoy in competition with the trade from foreign nations, and, on the other hand, they propose to levy a tax against money invested in industry, not against money which may be invested in municipal bonds or other bonds of people not engaged in business.

On the one hand, they deprive our industries of the benefit of the home market, and, on the other hand, tax them over the taxes which they now pay. No wonder the industries of the country are now largely paralyzed; no wonder that business is largely at a standstill, with the threat of Democratic success and Democratic policies which cut off at the end of earning and then tax, in addition, that which has been earned. I can see no defense to a proposition of that sort.

It was the Republican Party which submitted to the country an amendment permitting an income tax, and for that we still stand [applause on the Republican side]; but it is the Democratic Party which proposes not to tax incomes, but to tax industry. All other nations of the world which tax incomes endeavor to promote industry, but the Democratic policy is to endeavor to demote industry by taxing it and let idle incomes go scott free. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

It seems to be a morning for general confession, and I wish to state that I am going to vote against this bill on principle. I think it is unwise and unnecessary. I have a very distinct and vivid recollection of 1898, when the Spanish-American War began and it became necessary to raise money, that Congress in a very few days passed a bill for taxation which met the entire expenses of that war—between one and two hundred million dollars a year. No disturbance was created by it throughout the country; nobody felt it. After the bills were paid, a year after the Spanish War, one morning a resolution was brought in here to entirely discontinue that tax. A part of the law had been repealed the year before. One hundred and thirteen million dollars was the last discontinuance. It was repealed, and hardly anybody knew it for months after it was gone.

This bill is absolutely unnecessary to meet the expenses of this Government. It will cost infinitely more to collect this tax than it cost to collect the Spanish War tax. It will add hundreds and hundreds of employees to the already swollen pay roll of the United States.

The Spanish War system of taxation could be inaugurated if we needed money, but we do not. If we needed the money, a stamp system could be inaugurated, and all the money needed for your free wool and your free sugar, and for your deficiencies due to your system of tariff for revenue only, could be secured without the slightest difficulty. This is simply partisan Democratic legislation, with sectionalism stamped on every line of it, put forward for a purpose and not to procure necessary revenue.

You say you want to strike the rich and wealthy. If you do, put stamps on bank checks, tax rum and tobacco and luxuries generally. Why do you not do that? Use the stamp system which was used during the Spanish War and get anywhere from $50,000,000 to $200,000,000 revenue, as we did then, instead of organizing a great big spy system all over the United States and starting in for a lawsuit when you already know what you could do under the Spanish War taxation system. For that reason, if for no other, and because it is unnecessary, because it is not in accordance with American traditions, I am opposed to it and will vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, it is rather astounding that one of the veteran Members of this House should rise in his place and say that an income tax is not in accordance with American traditions. With the greatest respect for that gentleman and those here who applaud his statement, I beg leave to call attention to the fact that a great many income-tax acts have been on the statute books of the United States that were held constitutional by the Supreme Court, and that they were passed by Republican Houses of Representatives and Republican Senates and signed by Republican Presidents.

For the purpose of calling particular attention to this fact, I refer to the celebrated Pollock case itself, in which the learned Chief Justice, in his dissenting opinion, called attention to it in this paragraph:

> From 1861 to 1870 many laws levying taxes on income were enacted, as follows: Act of August 5, 1861 (ch. 45, 12 Stat., 292, 309, 311); act of July 1, 1862 (ch. 119, 12 Stat., 432, 473, 475); act of March 3, 1863 (ch. 74, 12 Stat., 713, 718, 723); act of June 30, 1864 (ch. 173, 13 Stat., 223, 281, 285); act of March 3, 1865 (ch. 78, 13 Stat., 469, 479, 481); act of March 10, 1866 (ch. 15, 14 Stat., 4, 5); act of July 13, 1866 (ch. 184, 14 Stat., 98, 137, 140); act of March 2, 1867 (ch. 169, 14 Stat., 471, 477, 480); act of July 14, 1870 (ch. 255, 16 Stat., 256, 261).

All of them were income-tax laws, and each and every one of them was passed by a Republican administration.

Now, this bill is not in terms an income-tax bill. It was argued here yesterday with a degree of ability not usually enjoyed or observed at any place, not even in this House. [Laughter.] It was presented by one of the ablest orators in America. The final conclusion is this, That the Supreme Court has plainly receded from the income-tax decision. In the Flint case, decided in 1910, it says that, for the very reason that men have organized into a corporation and enjoy the privilege of associating themselves in that manner, they may be lawfully taxed by an act of Congress for transacting business as a corporation on their annual income.

I believe that the Supreme Court ought to have an opportunity itself to recall the Pollock decision. [Applause.] I believe that the Supreme Court is the proper body to recall its own decisions. The learned and venerable Chief Justice, as has repeatedly been said here, is the only survivor of the court as it was constituted 18 years ago, when that decision was rendered. It simply decided by a majority of one that a tax on personal property or a tax on real property, or on the income of either, was a direct tax, and therefore had to be apportioned among the States according to population.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, it is now decided in the Flint case that if five men, say, associate themselves together as a corporation and own a hotel and rent the hotel to somebody else and derive an income of more than $5,000 per annum from it, they can be taxed as a corporation. The decision leaves the door open for another proposition. If these five men dissolve their corporation, form a partnership, and own the same hotel and rent it they could not be taxed, according to the Pollock case.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Flint decision is an intimation on the part of the court to the lawmaking bodies of the United States that they may enact an income-tax law, and I believe such a law will be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I wish to say that I have an abiding faith in the integrity of the Supreme Court of the United States. I wish to take this opportunity of saying now that no profit and no good can come from attacking that distinguished body. [Applause.] I would rather believe that the planets would leave their courses than that the Supreme Court of the United States would depart from the path of duty. [Applause.] Whoever under this flag raises his voice against that department of our Government is no lover of our common country. [Applause.]

I shall vote for this bill, and I believe that the apprehensions indulged in by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], who thinks that there may be something unconstitutional in it, are absolutely unwarranted.

I wish, in closing, to call attention to the specific point decided in the Flint case. I think it will become apparent to everyone, regardless of whether or not he has practiced law, that the present tax is levied on a privilege, and that is the bare privilege of being a corporation. In this bill we are levying a tax on a privilege, and that is the privilege of doing a profitable business. We have taken the liberty to define what we mean by "business." In this very Flint case the Supreme Court has said that the intention of Congress as manifested by the language of the act is entitled to great consideration. I shall read from the report the exact point decided in the Flint case:

> The tax under consideration, as we have construed the statute, may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity, i. e., with the advantages which arise from corporate or quasi corporate organization; or, when applied to insurance companies, for doing the business of such companies.

The bill under consideration before us provides that whoever enjoys the privilege of deriving from his vocation a sum in excess of $5,000 annually will be taxed to support the Government of the United States, and it will now become necessary for some gentlemen here to go forth and convince the people that it was wrong to quit levying tribute upon the tables of the American people by a tax on sugar and wrong to place the burden upon those who are best able to bear it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that this was a tax on industry. Three years ago he voted pointedly and directly for a tax on corporations that were engaged in industry. By what system of logic does he now deny the right of the Government to tax a rich man who enjoys a net income of more than $5,000 per annum, whether he derives it from industry or not? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the debate on the amendment I have pending be closed.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the opposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to this provision, as I understand it, is that if a man borrows $5,000 of a building and loan association or from any other source and invests it in a home, that will be taken into consideration and charged up to him as an income upon which, under this bill, he would have to pay taxes.

That proposition is without merit, as a reading of this bill shows, because if he borrows $5,000 and invests it in the building of a home or the purchase of a home or in other business that is not a net income and would not come under the taxing provisions of this bill.

Now, one other proposition. It has been urged here that the idle rich would escape the provisions of this bill and that the wealth of Carnegie and Rockefeller would escape taxation. That is a mistake. The rich idler is taxed under this bill, because his capital is employed. Wealth is the subject of taxation, profits made, and not the individual. The Rockefellers and the Carnegies have their money employed in business, not idle, and it will be taxed under the provisions of the first section of this bill.

Under the provisions of this measure the idle rich, as has been charged, do not escape, but, on the contrary, must pay. Large holders of wealth may be idle, but their wealth is not. They keep it employed earning more money, and it is not the person who is taxed, but the earnings of his money. Many very rich persons are not employed, but their capital is kept busy all the time earning profits, and under this bill in all such cases they will be required to pay the tax provided for in this measure. That is the object of the measure, and that is the feature which commends it to the favorable consideration of the people.

I am somewhat surprised at the position of gentlemen on that side when they say they are opposed to this bill because it would require the thrift of the country to be taxed, because it would require the business institutions of the country to pay a tax. What have you been doing all these years by your tariff legislation? You have been taxing every individual in this land to make a profit to the owners of the great industries of this country. By your tax laws, for every dollar you have derived in revenue to the Government you have collected from the pockets of the people $7 as an unearned profit to the owners of the great industries of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have levied a tax upon every consumer in this country for the benefit of the Sugar Trust; you have levied a tax upon every farmer and mechanic in this country for the benefit of the Steel Trust.

What is the difference between this tax which we propose and the one that you propose? We propose that this tax shall be levied and collected as revenue to the Government, and every dollar of it will go into the Treasury as revenue. Your policy has been to tax the people of this country, not for revenue, but as an unearned profit to the great protected industries of the country. This constitutes the distinction between the policy we propose by this measure and the one which your party has enforced for these many years it has been in power. The question therefore to be settled is, Shall we adopt a policy which raises revenue for the Government or one that raises revenue for private business? Shall the many be taxed to support the Government or the private business enterprises of a favored few? This is the real issue, and the people fully realize the distinction.

Upon this issue, my fellow Democrats, we can go to the country and safely rely upon the sound judgment of the American people to indorse our position. And when gentlemen on the other side say that they welcome this issue in the coming campaign, I say to them, also, we are ready and will meet them in the forum and on the hustings to discuss this question before the American people between now and the 5th day of next November, which day we long for, as it will usher in a great Democratic victory achieved by the voters of this country in behalf of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says, if you want to raise revenue for the Government, why do you not put a stamp tax on bank checks? We are going to raise the money more equitably and fairly to the American people through this measure, by obtaining this revenue from those who are the better able to pay it. When a tax is placed on bank checks revenues are raised without reference to the amounts of the same, and its burdens are inequitably distributed and do not fall on those best able to bear them. Such an objection should always have consideration in the enactment of every revenue measure, and it will be observed this measure wisely escapes that objection, and this will commend it with great favor to the people of the country. They will approve this feature and indorse its manifest fairness.

It taxes those who have heretofore escaped paying their proportion of taxes to support the Government.

Mr. HILL. If you want to raise more money, why do you not increase the tax on rum and tobacco?

Mr. CULLOP. In reply to the gentleman I would say these subjects will receive proper attention at the hands of the Democratic Party, as it believes in the equalization of the burdens for the support of the Government. It also believes in taxing luxuries highest and necessities lowest, and it proposes to apply this rule in all taxation before it is through, and these items will receive proper attention at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. Under the order of the committee debate on this amendment is closed. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, strike out the words "Provided, That no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 35, noes 56.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 2, by adding the following:
"And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States or to the judges of the inferior courts of the United States established by Congress."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of making this tax, if possible, come under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Article III, section 1, provides as follows:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

It is hardly necessary to say that under the terms of this act Congress, which has fixed the compensation of these judges, now diminishes it by the amount which they will be compelled to contribute in the payment of this so-called tax from their salaries. This is in direct conflict with the plain terms of the Constitution.

I offer this amendment also for the purpose of calling the attention of this House to the manner in which this bill has been drawn; to the absolute disregard of the Constitution and its requirements; to the carelessness with which its provisions have been thought out. This bill has been drawn in the nature of, if not with the name of, an income tax. But, Mr. Chairman, to draw a general income tax is a work that requires the most careful attention. It is a work to which should be given the best thought and attention of the Members of this House. It should not be hastily framed as a political expedient. It should be carefully considered and carefully drawn, and the Members on this side of the House are ready to give that kind of care and attention to that work and to support such a bill when it shall be presented. But now to have this character of bill presented with the provisions which gentlemen on that side must certainly recognize as not well considered, is not the work of statesmen or of Members who remember their obligations to their country in the passage of important legislation of this kind.

If it shall be deemed by these gentlemen as necessary to act hastily, let me suggest to them that it would have been an easy matter for them to have changed the phraseology of the present corporation-tax law by amending it to read 2 instead of 1 per cent that should be paid as a tax on the income of a corporation, and they would have added $30,000,000 to the revenue of the country, and accomplished it in a way that the Supreme Court has already determined is absolutely constitutional. But these gentlemen who are so ready to use their invective and denunciation against these gigantic corporations when upon the floor of the House have nothing now to add by way of penalizing them when they have the opportunity so to do. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is necessary to correct a feature of this bill where it has not been well and carefully considered. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, but it occurs to me that it is rather amusing to listen to the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who seems to think that this side of the House has illy considered this bill and other legislation of this character, and that he should see fit to suggest to this side of the House in the closing moments of debate how we might change the corporation law so as to get $30,000,000 more. It seems strange to me that the gentleman should make the statement that this bill should not apply to the judges of the Supreme Court as to their salaries, and then argue to this House—and I take it he is a good lawyer—in the manner he does, but he is now talking politics himself. Then, when he makes the statement that Congress has no right to tax the judges of the Supreme Court and that it is taking away from their salaries, it occurs to me that Congress has as much right to tax the members of the Supreme Court as it has the man out in Iowa or Illinois. [Applause.]

I do not look upon the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court with such awe, nor do I look upon their occupying so high a place that the same law ought not to apply to them as to other people. They ought to be willing, and I judge they are, as great jurists as I believe them to be, to pay out of their salaries a just proportion for the support of this Government.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. This is not a tax on the amount of property, but under the terms of this act it applies to the income which they receive. Congress has fixed the income. Congress now by this act reduces the income and therefore they are deprived of the salary that the Constitution of the United States says shall not be diminished during their term of office.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will say that in my judgment this does not decrease the salary of a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States one cent. The statement might be made with equal force that we ought not to tax them on their homes in which they live for fear that it would reduce their salaries. The gentleman from Iowa surely does not contend that. We have a perfect right to tax the members of the Supreme Court who own houses in the city of Washington. That amount has to come out of their salaries to pay those taxes, and why should not Congress have the right to take from their salaries a portion of their income to pay their portion of the expenses of this Government? [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the proviso of the bill which directs the disbursing officers of the Government to "deduct and withhold the aforesaid tax of 1 per cent"?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. That is only the manner of collecting the tax; an administration provision of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for the bill, and wish to express my reasons therefor. Notwithstanding the statement to the contrary of gentlemen on both sides of the House, I deny that this is a partisan measure. For more than 50 years the Republican Party has applied the principle which it is sought here to enforce, in so far as permitted by the decisions of the Supreme Court, by this bill. In this House and in the Senate almost every man, both Republican and Democrat, has in various ways supported this principle. It is said that this bill is an attempt to impose an income tax in disguise. I shall not undertake to discuss that question, but if it was so, it would make little difference with my vote. I have always been in favor of an income tax as the fairest, the most just, and most equitable way of imposing taxation. [Applause.] I believe that this bill is a step in that direction. It may be that it is a feeble and halting step, fettered as we possibly are by the decision of the Supreme Court; but nevertheless the trend of it is in the direction that a taxing system ought to go, namely, to place the burdens of the Government upon those who are best able to bear them. [Applause.] When this bill, if it should become an act, comes before the Supreme Court, the question must inevitably arise as to the validity of an income tax, and it is my desire, so far as I am concerned, that that question should again be submitted. I have never believed, and do not now believe, that the decision in the Pollock case was correct, and it certainly was not in accordance with the prior decisions of the court which rendered it. Such being the case, considering the manner in which the court is now constituted, I believe that a different decision would be rendered, and I hope to see it rendered on this bill when submitted to it. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the mission of the Democratic Party, through the Democratic majority in this House, is to restore in the Government a confidence now badly shattered; that that confidence has been shattered in a large degree is evidenced by the presence in this Chamber of a Member of the Socialist Party. His membership in this House is a concrete expression of the dissatisfaction resulting from the widening gap between those who have and those who have not, and in contemplating that condition in our national affairs one is led to the conclusion that immense fortunes have been made and amassed through a series of laws absolutely designed to build up great wealth in the hands of a few to the absolute impoverishment of millions of American citizens. [Applause.] There is no questioning the fact that the poor man never escapes taxation. It is an absolute impossibility for him to escape it. He constitutes the level upon which the weight of taxation rests, and the taxgatherer never fails to find him. The rich, with their devious methods of evasion, with their employed legal subtleties, with their ability to skip from State to State, find it easy to get away from the imposts that are levied for the support of government; and so in coming to the support of this bill the Democratic majority rejoices in the opportunity to raise the burden of taxation from the shoulders of the many and to place a portion of that taxation upon the shoulders of those well qualified and well able to sustain it. [Applause.]

The great difference in fortunes has made discontent rife, and precipitated into the arena of political discussion wild and vague theories of government cunningly calculated to destroy its very foundations. We have to face the situation as we find it and to make laws in accordance with the Constitution, which will bring a better era of feeling and prove to the people that the Government is for all men and their welfare and not for the few. There is no need of any hysterical legislation; there is no need of any radical changes in our form of government; but there is decided need for our present agencies of government, acting with impartiality and in accordance with the beliefs of the founders of this Government, to keep forever established the principle of equal opportunities for all, and special privileges to none.

It has been said by the majority leader in this debate [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in 1894 holding the income tax to be unconstitutional gave rise to a belief on the part of the people that the rich were exempt from the taxing power of Congress. How well founded that claim was is proved by the prophetic utterance of the now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Justice White, who, at that time, in his dissenting opinion, called forcible attention to the fact that the majority of the court had by their decision overthrown—a long and consistent line of decisions, and denied to the legislative department of the Government the possession of a power conceded to it by universal consensus for 100 years, and which has been recognized by repeated adjudications of this court.

He sounded a warning against the policy, then being enunciated by the court, which would reverse the past, make helpless the power of the Nation to raise revenue through a time-honored custom, especially in the hour of national danger, and implant in the hearts of the people a distrust not easily overcome. It is fitting to again quote his words and match the conditions of our day with what he said would come to pass.

My inability to agree with the court in the conclusions which it has just expressed causes me much regret. Great as is my respect for any view by it announced, I can not resist the conviction that its opinion and decree in this case virtually annuls its previous decisions in regard to the powers of Congress on the subject of taxation, and is therefore fraught with danger to the court, to each and every citizen, and to the Republic. The conservation and orderly development of our institutions rests on our acceptance of the results of the past and their use as lights to guide our steps in the future. Teach the lesson that settled principles may be overthrown at any time, and confusion and turmoil must ultimately result. In the discharge of its functions of interpreting the Constitution this court exercises an august power. It sits removed from the contentions of political parties and the animosities of factions. It seems to me that the accomplishment of its lofty mission can only be secured by the stability of its teachings and the sanctity which surrounds them. If the permanency of its conclusions is to depend upon the personal opinions of those who from time to time may make up its membership it will inevitably become a theater of political strife and its action will be without coherence or consistency. There is no great principle about constitutional law, such as the nature and extent of the commerce power, or the currency power, or other powers of the Federal Government, which has not been ultimately defined by the adjudications of this court after long and earnest struggle. If we are to go back to the original sources of our political system or are to appeal to the writings of the economists in order to unsettle all these great principles, everything is lost and nothing saved to the people.

The rights of every individual are guaranteed by the safeguards which have been thrown around them by our adjudications. If these are to be assailed and overthrown, as is the settled law of income taxation by this opinion, as I understand it, the rights of property, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, are of little worth. My strong convictions forbid that I take part in a conclusion which seems to me so full of peril to the country. I am unwilling to do so, without reference to the question of what my personal opinion upon the subject might be if the question were a new one, and was thus unaffected by the action of the framers, the history of the Government, and the long line of decisions by this court. The wisdom of our forefathers in adopting a written Constitution has often been impeached upon the theory that the interpretation of a written instrument did not afford as complete protection to liberty as would be enjoyed under a constitution made up of the traditions of a free people. Writing, it has been said, does not insure greater stability than tradition does, while it destroys flexibility. The answer has always been that by the foresight of the fathers the construction of our written Constitution was ultimately confided to this body, which, from the nature of its judicial structure, could always be relied upon to act with perfect freedom from the influence of faction and to preserve the benefits of consistent interpretations. The fundamental conception of a judicial body is that of one hedged about by precedents which are binding on the court without regard to the personality of its members. Break down this belief in judicial continuity and let it be felt that on great constitutional questions this court is to depart from the settled conclusions of its predecessors and to determine them all according to the mere opinion of those who temporarily fill its bench, and our Constitution will, in my judgment, be bereft of value and become a most dangerous instrument to the rights and liberties of the people.

[Applause.]

In the same dissenting opinion he said:

The facts, then, are briefly these: At the very birth of the Government a contention arose as to the meaning of the word "direct." The controversy was determined by the legislative and executive departments of the Government. Their action came to this court for review, and it was approved. Every judge of this court who expressed an opinion made use of language which clearly showed that he thought the word "direct" in the Constitution applied only to capitation taxes and taxes directly on land. Thereafter the construction thus given was accepted everywhere as definitive. The matter came again and again to this court, and in every case the original ruling was adhered to. The suggestions made in the Hylton case were adopted here, and, in the last case here decided, reviewing all the others, this court said the direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution were only taxes on land and capitation taxes. And now, after a hundred years, after long-continued action by other departments of the Government, and after repeated adjudications of this court, this interpretation is overthrown and the Congress is declared not to have a power of taxation which may at some time, as it has in the past, prove necessary to the very existence of the Government.

At the time Justice White delivered this dissenting opinion, so pregnant with meaning and significance, the court held the income tax to be unconstitutional because it levied a direct tax on the income from real estate and from municipal bonds. As to whether Congress could levy a tax on incomes derived from other sources the court were evenly divided, standing 4 to 4. Acting upon a petition for a rehearing, the court, with a full bench of nine members, again held the tax to be unconstitutional by a vote of 5 to 4. Justice Jackson, who did not sit in the first case, sided with the four who had voted at the first hearing for the constitutionality of the tax upon incomes derived from other sources than that raised from real estate and municipal bonds. But one of the four who, in the first instance, had voted for the constitutionality of the tax went over to the other side, thereby giving a majority against the constitutionality of the tax, and causing the court to reverse the precedents of a century. Well may we ponder at this stage of our national life the words of Justice Harlan in his dissenting opinion:

I have a deep, abiding conviction, which my sense of duty compels me to express, that it is not possible for this court to have rendered any judgment more to be regretted than the one just rendered.

He called attention to the vast sums of money that had been raised to prosecute and bring the Civil War to a successful close through the instrumentality of an income tax, and that the court was now saying, in effect, that all of that money had been taken from the people in disregard of the Constitution.

Citing Oliver Ellsworth, whom John Adams declared to be the firmest pillar of Washington's administration in the Senate, Justice Harlan recalled that great statesman's words in the Connecticut convention of 1788, when he said:

Wars have now become rather wars of the purse than of the sword. Government must, therefore, be able to command the whole power of the purse; otherwise a hostile nation may look into our Constitution, see what resources are in the power of Government, and calculate to go a little beyond us; thus they may obtain a decided superiority over us and reduce us to the utmost distress. A government which can command but half its resources is like a man with but one arm to defend himself.

Noting the special privilege that would be conferred upon the wealthy class of our population, he said:

By its present construction of the Constitution the court, for the first time in all its history, declares that our Government has been so framed that in matters of taxation for its support and maintenance those who have incomes derived from the renting of real estate or from the leasing or using of tangible personal property, or who own invested personal property—bonds, stocks, and investments of whatever kind—have privileges than can not be accorded to those having incomes derived from the labor of their hands or the exercise of their skill or the use of their brains.

To those who have a fear of the United States Supreme Court rejecting this proposed excise law as unconstitutional the words of Justice Brown in his dissenting opinion are timely:

Congress ought never to legislate, in raising the revenues of the Government, in fear that important laws like this shall encounter the veto of this court through a change in its opinion or be crippled in great political crises by its inability to raise a revenue for immediate use.

Justice Jackson in his dissenting opinion said:

The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principles of equality in taxation, but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the Government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having most ability to bear them. This decision, in effect, works out a directly opposite result in relieving the citizens having the greater ability, while the burdens of taxation are made to fall most heavily and oppressively upon those having the least ability.

The Republican Senator from Idaho [WILLIAM E. BORAH], speaking in the United States Senate on May 3, 1909, said, in reviewing the history of the United States Supreme Court upon the constitutionality of the income tax:

In the first place we must bear in mind that during the hundred years which preceded the Pollock case 21 judges occupying places upon that high tribunal had decided in favor of an income tax and of its constitutionality or had given such definition to the phrase "direct tax" as would sustain an income tax. Against those 21 judges, in the whole history of the court, there have been but 5 judges during that entire period who dissented. In other words, 5 judges alone in the whole history of the Supreme Court, from its organization to the present hour, have decided that an income tax was unconstitutional, while 21 judges have written opinions or joined in opinions to the contrary. Amongst those who have taken the view that an income tax is constitutional and that a direct tax relates only to land, capitation taxes, and taxes on improvements upon land are the elder Chase, Patterson, Iredell, Wilson, Chief Justice Chase, Nelson, Grier, Clifford, Swayne, Miller, Davis, Waite, Hunt, Strong, Bradley, Jackson, Brown, Harlan, White, and Ellsworth. Since the organization of that court every single writer upon constitutional law in America has adopted the view that a direct tax related alone to land and capitation taxes.

The surest avenue to discontent among the masses of the people is the granting of special privilege to the few. How brilliant and forceful and caustic was the dissection by the Republican Senator, John J. Ingalls, of the conditions that inspired his antagonism. Speaking in the Senate, on January 14, 1891, of the distribution of wealth in the United States, he said:

A table has been compiled for the purpose of showing how wealth in this country is distributed, and it is full of the most startling admonition. It has appeared in the magazines, it has been commented upon in this Chamber, it has been the theme of editorial discussion. It appears from this compilation that there are in the United States 200 persons who have an aggregate of more than $20,000,000 each. Four hundred persons possess $10,000,000 each, 1,000 possess $5,000,000 each, 2,000 possess $2,500,000 each, 6,000 persons possess $1,000,000 each, and 15,000 persons $500,000 each, making a total of 24,600 people who possess $36,250,000,000. Mr. President, it is the most appalling statement that ever fell upon mortal ears. It is, so far as the results of democracy as a social and political experiment are concerned, the most terrible commentary that ever was reported in the book of time; and Nero fiddles while Rome burns. It is thrown off with a laugh and a sneer, "as the froth upon beer" of our social and political system. As I said, the assessed valuation recorded in the great national ledger standing to our credit is about $65,000,000,000. Our population is 62,000,000, and by some means, by some device, by some machination, by some incantation, honest or otherwise, by some process that can not be defined, less than two-thousandth part of our population have obtained possession—and have kept out of the penitentiary in spite of the means they have adopted to acquire it—of more than one-half of the entire accumulated wealth of the country.

This is not the worst, Mr. President. It has been largely acquired by men who have contributed little to the material welfare of the country, and by processes that I do not care in appropriate terms to describe, by the wrecking of the fortunes of innocent men, women, and children, by jugglery, by bookkeeping, by financiering, by what the Senator from Ohio calls "speculation," and this process goes on with frightful and constantly accelerating rapidity. The entire industry of the country is passing under the control of organized and federated capital.

In his essay on "The present distribution of wealth in the United States," Charles B. Spahr, Ph. D., classified the wealth of the country according to the following table:

The United States, 1890.

Estates.	Number of families.	Aggregate wealth.	Average wealth.
The wealthy classes, $50,000 and over ...	125,000	$33,000,000,000	$264,000
The well-to-do classes, $50,000 to $5,000 ..	1,375,000	23,000,000,000	16,000
The middle classes, $5,000 to $500.....	5,500,000	8,200,000,000	1,500
The poorer classes under $500.....	5,500,000	800,000,000	150
Total.....	12,500,000	65,000,000,000	5,200

He concluded that seven-eighths of the families held but one-eighth of the national wealth, while one-eighth of the families held the remaining seven-eighths. In his classification of incomes he found that more than five-sixths of the incomes of the wealthiest class are received by the 125,000 richest families, while less than one-half of the incomes of the working classes are received by the poorer 6,500,000 families.

He sums up the situation by saying that one-eighth of the families in America receive more than half of the aggregate income and the richest 1 per cent receives a larger income than the poorest 50 per cent.

In fact—

He says—

this small class of wealthy property owners receives from property alone as large an income as half of our people receive from property and labor.

I do not believe that there is any greater proportionate distribution of wealth among the masses of the people to-day than in 1890, and no doubt the same proportion of distribution obtains among the 18,000,000 families of to-day, and the estimated $150,000,000,000 of our national wealth.

These figures are more eloquent than the speeches of statesmen; they spell gross inequality, and unequal opportunity. They furnish fuel to the flame of discontent and dissatisfaction. They provoke a restless longing for a change in government. The people have been baffled in their legitimate desire for legislative and judicial expression of their civil needs. Let the Supreme Court say that this bill is constitutional—and we must remember that the President has expressed confidence in the ability of Congress to frame a constitutional measure—let its workings testify to the power of government to exact from the possessors of great fortunes a fair measure of the burden of taxation, and I venture the prophecy that the demand for the recall of judges will pass away, only to be remembered as an ephemeral expression of popular discontent. The spectacle of 51 men possessing $3,295,000,000 and wielding a life-and-death influence upon our commercial life, and at the same time escaping the burdens of taxation is poorly calculated to sustain a profound faith in the Government.

That conservative Republican statesman, Senator John Sherman, whose name was connected with every great financial measure from 1860 to 1900, said in 1882:

> The public mind is not yet prepared to apply the key to a genuine revenue reform. A few years of further experience will convince the whole body of our people that a system of national taxes which rests the whole burden of taxation on consumption and not one cent on property or incomes is intrinsically unjust. While the expenses of the National Government are largely caused by the protection of property, it is but right to require property to contribute to their payment. It will not do to say that each person consumes in proportion to his means. This is not true. Everyone must see that the consumption of the rich does not bear the same relation to the consumption of the poor as the income of the one does to the wages of the other. * * * As wealth accumulates this injustice in the fundamental basis of our system will be felt and forced upon the attention of Congress.

Has the time not come to change the system of taxation so as to relieve consumption and make incomes stand their share?

Why does the Republican Party fail to heed the warnings and admonitions of those who had prevision and cling instead to a system that enriches beyond the dreams of avarice a favored few, with disastrous consequences to the great body of the people?

Ex-President Roosevelt has declared himself on the subject in the following language:

> When our tax laws are revised the question of an income tax and an inheritance tax should receive the careful attention of our legislators. In my judgment, both of the taxes should be part of our system of Federal taxation.

Some people have expressed a fear as to the realization of a sufficient amount of money through the agency of an income tax. The successful operation of the tax in this country from 1863 to 1873 may well dissipate any fears on that score. Beginning with $2,000,000 in 1863, it reached $73,000,000 in 1866, and in the period covered from 1865 to 1870 it realized in all about $285,000,000. It has been a source of steady income in Great Britain from 1842. In that country it was first imposed by Pitt in 1798 in order to meet the expenses of the French War. It was imposed with varying rates and exemptions in 1803, 1805, and 1807. It was abolished in 1816 and reimposed by Sir Robert Peel on June 22, 1842, at the rate of 7d. in the pound on all incomes exceeding £150. In 1842 the tax produced about £5,000,000, and in 1909–10 the amount produced was £37,679,902, or about $180,000,000.

If this bill becomes a law—and it has been drafted with a care to impress the court with its constitutionality—I believe it will inspire confidence in the Government and prove to the people that the great fortunes of the country must submit to the taxing power of Congress. Intrenched wealth can laugh at the storms of panics; sitting in luxury on the hilltops, it can complacently look down on the multitude in the valley struggling for an existence. Would for the betterment of Democratic institutions and the permanency of our Government that these great fortunes had not in so many instances been built up by the largesse of our tariff laws, wringing tribute from the masses for the enrichment of a few manufacturers. Would that the great fortunes of our country were not built upon watered stocks, which have taken millions from a credulous public, duped by the engraver's art and printer's ink in the form of gilded certificates frequently of about as much value as wall paper.

This bill is a fitting complement to the free-sugar bill, which deprives the Treasury of $53,000,000 of revenue; this measure will give in its stead $60,000,000. The sugar bill relieves the consumer of a tax of 2 cents per pound on sugar; and this bill, taxing all incomes above $5,000 per annum made in business, will reach out to the fortunes of the Carnegies, the Rockefellers, the Morgans, the Vanderbilts, and their like, and teach their possessors, through its exactions and provisions, that men must contribute to the support of the Government whose departments and agencies protect their property and through whose protection and, in many instances, the bounties of the Government those fortunes were acquired.

The Democratic Party seeks to establish not only confidence in the Government by impressing upon the public mind the fact that wealth as well as poverty must bear its fair share of taxation, but also seeks to reestablish through the decision of the Supreme Court the precedents of a century so unfortunately overthrown by the change of one jurist's mind in 1895.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the musical, though occasionally discordant and sometimes dramatic, leader of the minority, announced that it is no wonder that the business and industry of the country are well-nigh paralyzed now. That was an emphatic and dominant note from the chorus of disaster which has been swelling and falling until it became the requiem of calamity, running all through this debate on that side of the House.

But, come to think of it, the wonder is that there is not some truth in the wail of woe and that business has not long since been paralyzed and industry destroyed, for so long have the destinies of the Nation been in the hands of standpatters and minions of special privilege that it is like unto a miracle that anything at all remains out of the hands of a few favorites, as, indeed, nothing would have survived had it not been for the splended capacity and industry of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose that, out of the redundance of Democratic good will, I might help out the minority, and I know I can do so if they will but take my advice. Having leveled all the chimneys in the country, having quenched all the fires in everything but the fireflies, having broken all the staffs upon which we used to lean, having stopped all the locomotives and bedeviled all the bridges, not to speak of having silenced all the whistles from Maine to California—yes; having gone from one end of the country to the other, devastating and blasting with this Democratic legislation, which you all say can never be enacted into law, the hopes of humanity in general—I say, having done all this, let me give you an argument which will appeal to the intelligence of the Nation ever more strongly than any of the arguments which you have thus far presented.

Look, Mr. Chairman, how the sun comes out in his regal glory to-day. See how the springtime is beginning to break upon us, flooding the world with its charms, and behold how its glints appear amid the varied colors of this historic ceiling. Hear the cardinal, blithe warbler of the budding year, as he sings in the parks around the Capitol, little recking his impending doom, for, Mr. Chairman, the spring will not spring, the buds will not blow, the leaves will not come out again. Ah, yes; and "the law will stop the blades of grass from growing as they grow" just so surely as we find truth and logic in the arguments that you have made against this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Still, I give you this appealing issue, for you need it. You have left nothing that can be an issue of life and meaning but the weather. You have destroyed all else. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Only a moment ago the minority, led by the distinguished former Speaker of the House, Mr. CANNON, seemed to be uniting in the revised chant, "What shall we do when the Democrats break the country up?" [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

During this debate you have pointed out that everything is wrong and that there is crimson catastrophe on all sides, so far as this mundane sphere is concerned. But there remain the heavens and what you have spared from the once bounteous earth. Look to these and sound the alarm, lest they, too, perish. Arise, ye patriots of calamity, and declare that the Democracy will put the universe out of order, lengthen the day, extend the night, dim the stars, tax the income of the man in the moon, and change our computation of time. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Appeal to the people and tell them that there will be no flowers on the hillsides, no daisies in the dells, and that the brooklets will never more murmur their songs as they ripple down the mountain to the vale below. Tell them that the trees will no longer whisper in the twilight their romantic gossip of the glories of nature anywhere in these unhappy United States. Yes, tell them that the valleys will retain their snow and ice the whole year round as the result of Democratic success.

[Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] When you have done all this, you will have an issue which can not fail to appeal to everybody, and it will be as logical, far more eloquent, and infinitely more poetic than any issue that you can ever coin again out of the ghostly memories of your past. In the meantime we must stick to our old issue, which, like the one I have just given you, will reach everybody beneath the flag and in the flying machines above it, namely, the high cost of living, and the mission of the Democracy to bring it down and relieve the masses of the burdens of unnecessary taxation. It is an old-fashioned issue to be sure, but we shall stick to it, even though you go on proving in your own more or less comprehensive way that to give the people such relief will be to destroy and strike down all that now remains standing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have already addressed the House at some length upon this subject and did not intend to consume any more time, but in view of the fact that during this debate so much has been said to obscure the real issue before us, it seems to me that before voting we had better ascertain what we are voting on. I hope even the eloquent poem which has just been recited on the birds and flowers and the weather may not blind our eyes altogether to the real question.

Throughout the course of this debate gentlemen have argued eloquently and learnedly in favor of an income tax, but the bill before us today is not an income tax. Gentlemen have argued ably and learnedly that the Supreme Court might modify or change the decision in the Pollock case should an income-tax bill be brought before them. But this is not an income-tax bill. What is this bill? It is an excise tax on the annual gains of partnerships and individuals from doing business. What is its object? It is to raise revenue. How much revenue? The revenue made necessary by abrogating the duties in the sugar schedule. Gentlemen of the majority say that this bill will raise $60,000,000 of revenue. I do not believe that they have any idea it will. Certainly I do not believe that any reasonable man who examines the conditions can conceive this to be at all possible. It is perfect and absolute folly to say that there are in this country incomes of $6,000,000,000 a year, not earned by corporations, not earned from the bonds of States, counties, and municipalities, not earned by people having an income of less than $5,000 a year. The statement is absurd upon its face. This bill can not raise $60,000,000 or even a fraction of that sum, even though it should be constitutional in every respect. I am willing to admit, so far as I am concerned, that this bill is constitutional in so far as it taxes business incomes. The question that will come before the court, if this bill should ever have to be construed, would be whether or not any given income taxed is in fact a business income. There will be no other question before the court, and think, Mr. Chairman, of the interminable lawsuits that such a procedure would make necessary. I can not bring myself to believe that it is just in measuring the income of an individual to include with it incomes which are not in any sense earned from business, as is provided in the case of corporations in the corporation-tax law. The two things seem to me essentially different. But whether that be true or not this bill is not justifiable either as a revenue measure or as a fair and well-considered system of taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I presume that all taxes levied by civilized countries upon the citizens would be conceded without argument to be a burden upon the citizen; especially is this true of a tax such as the one proposed by this bill. The burden of taxes is one of the penalties the citizen pays for being civilized, or rather for the privileges and blessings he enjoys while living in a civilized community, and in the security of his protected rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. The savage who dwells in a tent and is content with the simple life of a barbarian escapes these burdens. It is true we all complain more or less about the taxes we have to pay, but it has been my observation that when the taxpayers see the money collected from them honestly, intelligently, and economically expended in caring for the unfortunate, the education of the young, and the consistent improvement and development of the community, State or Nation, little complaint is heard. But it is the extravagant waste and needless expenditure of the money collected from the people by those intrusted with the control of public affairs that arouses the feeling of discontent, and as the burden grows heavier from year to year the masses become more and more dissatisfied and desperate. Revolution is the final climax and the glory of a hundred or a thousand years of national fame goes out in darkness; the historian closes his book and begins another chapter in the history of the human race.

It has been asserted that this bill is an unjust burden upon the energy and frugality of the citizen. All direct taxes levied upon the income or earning power of the citizen must necessarily be so, and I know of no principle in the field of taxation whereby the emulators of the fabled youth and his clarion motto can escape. It has been well said that the fathers of the Republic wrought wisely when they devised the scheme of indirect taxation for the Government, reserving the method of direct taxation to the States. This is as it should be, in my judgment. However, I am not opposed to the principle of an income or excise tax levied by the Government in cases of emergency, and I think that the Government should have the unquestioned power and authority to make use of this method of raising revenue in time of war or other national calamity, and so believing, it was with pleasure, while serving as a member of the Illinois Senate, that I voted for the approval of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will forever put at rest the question of the Government's power and authority under the Constitution to levy and collect such a tax. Neither am I opposed to the principle of special taxation, and I earnestly advocated and voted for the enactment of the present inheritance-tax law in the State of Illinois. But I am just as emphatically opposed to the National Government making use of these methods of taxation in times of peace, and thereby usurping a power of taxation which should be reserved to the respective States. The State which I have in part the honor to represent is, as has been well said, "an empire of itself."

The necessity for raising additional revenue is becoming greater each year in that great Commonwealth, and I assert, as one of her citizens, that the privilege of levying special taxes upon the wealth of the citizens should be reserved to the State, except in case of national emergency, when in such case Illinois will again, as she always has, cheerfully contribute of her substance, and sons, if necessary, for the maintenance and perpetuity of our great Nation. It has been asserted on this floor that we are now facing an emergency—a deficit in the National Treasury—which will result from the reduction of some $50,000,000 in the revenue by the passage of the free-sugar bill. This argument, in my judgment, is not sound, and I feel constrained to say that by economical management of governmental affairs there will be no deficit, even with sugar on the free list; and, further, should such a thing be possible the field of internal revenue, which is the undisputed domain of the Federal Government for the purposes of raising revenue, has scarcely been touched, and the possibilities of the same are unknown, but evidently so rich that there can be no possible danger of the Government coming to want for needed revenue for ages yet to come. I am fully aware of the value of this piece of legislation as a campaign argument. The wonderful possibilities of the demagogue on the stump eloquently and dramatically portraying the misfortune and injustice of the humble citizen and his wonderful sympathy for him and what he would do "to the idle rich" would be no small thing. But, gentlemen of the committee, we are not legislating simply for the purpose of campaign arguments, but should in all our efforts be guided by what seems to us to be right. As I said before, I am not opposed to the principle involved in this bill or in special taxation levied upon the more fortunate of our citizens. But were it in my power to prepare a bill, I would make it more general than this and graduate it as the wealth of the citizen increased. But, feeling that this form of taxation should be forever reserved to the States, except in case of national emergency, I am opposed to the enactment of this law, believing that the respective States have greater burdens to bear than the National Government. I therefore have no hesitancy in voting against this measure. [Appluase.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, every time the effort is made in this House to reduce the tariff tax upon the people the Republican side of this House presents the argument of the unconstitutionality of the measure, and every time that party gets the opportunity it increases the tax burden of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, when the Democratic majority, speaking for the American people, undertakes to place the Government tax up those most able to bear it, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] comes forward with the Spanish-American war-tax scheme. That tax was paid by the people who were least able to pay it. [Applause.] The gentleman from Connecticut wants the stamp-tax law reenacted. Mr. Chairman, every poor man who had a few dollars in the bank had to pay the stamp tax every time he drew out a small sum of money. The poor man in distress who had to borrow money and give his note for it had to pay the stamp tax; the poor man who mortgaged his home or his farm or his crop or his horse or anything else had to pay a stamp tax; and when he finally lost his home he had to pay the tax on the stamps that went upon the deed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. Under the order of the House two hours having been devoted to debate under the five-minute rule, in pursuance of the further order of the House the committee will now rise.

Accordingly the committee rose and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has had under consideration the bill H. R. 21214, and has directed me to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass with an amendment. There is also an amendment pending to the bill which has not yet been acted upon.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the previous question is considered as ordered on the bill and amendments. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 2, by adding the following:

"And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the judges of the inferior courts of the United States established by Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 12, by striking out the word "gross" and inserting the word "net" in lieu thereof.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the amended bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Illinois both demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 253, nays 40, answered "present" 6, not voting 97, as follows:

Commencing March 11 and ending April 2:

Mr. BURGESS with Mr. WEEKS.

Until April 5:

Mr. THAYER with Mr. AMES.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTERS FOR SEAGOING VESSELS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for filing views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 16692) to provide American registers for seagoing vessels, and so forth, be extended for seven legislative days (H. Rept. 405, pt. 2).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the time for filing the views of the minority on H. R. 16692 be extended for seven legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLICITY OF CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGNS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to renew the request I made a few moments ago to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will wait until the Chair states the question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain forms, which were agreed upon between him and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as to certain affidavits touching the expenses of the candidates for Congress before nomination and after nomination and before and after election, and to extend his remarks. Coupled with that was the request of the gentleman from Illinois to amend by ordering the Clerk to print these forms for the candidates for Congress, sitting Members, and others.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that I do not think this will do any good, yet I do not think it will do any harm. I have examined the papers, prepared, I am informed, by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and as there seems to be some desire on the part of the Members of the House to have the matter disposed of in the way in which it has been requested to be acted upon by both the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois, while I do not withdraw any suggestions I may have made with reference to the matter, I do not feel inclined to press my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, after conference with several Members of the House, I have taken it upon myself to confer with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, about the form of statement which is required to be made by each candidate for Congress. Under the existing law every candidate who receives a nomination and is voted upon at the election is required to make four statements. The first one must be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days next before the primary election or nominating convention. The law directs what kind of statement shall be made by such candidate. The gentleman from Illinois and myself have agreed upon a form which we offer for use by each candidate if he desires it. We have no intention to make the use of this form mandatory. Every individual, of course, is expected to construe the law for himself and to file a statement in accordance with the law as he understands it.

We submit, however, a form for use prior to the nomination as follows:

(To be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., not less than 10 or more than 15 days before the date of the primary election or nominating convention.

The depositing of this statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, duly stamped and registered, within the time above required, is a sufficient filing of the statement.)

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF CANDIDATE FOR NOMINATION FOR REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS.

(For filing before primary election or nominating convention.)

I hereby certify that the following is a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by me or by anyone for me with my knowledge and consent from any source, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part, in aid or support of my candidacy for the ——— nomination for Representative in the Congress of the United States from the ——— congressional district of the State of ———, at the primary election (nominating convention) to be held in said district on the ——— day of ———, 1912, viz:

Also, that the following is a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by me, or by my agent, representative, or other person for or in my behalf with my knowledge or consent, together with the names of those to whom such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring my nomination at such primary election (nominating convention), not including any money expended by me to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which I reside or for my necessary personal expenses incurred for myself alone for travel, subsistence, stationery, postage, or writing or printing (other than in newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, or for telegraph and telephone service, viz:

(Signature of candidate) ——— ———,

(Address) ———.

——— ———, ss:

———, being duly sworn, deposes (affirms) and says that the foregoing is a true and correct statement of his candidacy for nomination for Congress and of all the receipts and expenditures in aid or support of his candidacy as therein above set forth.

———.

Subscribed and sworn to (affirmed) before me this — day of ———, A. D. 1912.

[SEAL.] ———.

MEMORANDUM: The above statement must be verified by oath or affirmation of the candidate before an officer in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, unless such candidate shall be in attendance upon Congress as a Member thereof, in which case he may verify his statement in the District of Columbia.

NOMINATION FOR CONGRESS.

Statement of receipts and expenses of ——— ———, — district of ——— ———.

Primary or convention, ———, 1912.

Mailed ———, 1912.

Received and filed ———, 1912.

The next statement which is required to be filed by any person who is a candidate for the nomination for Congress must be filed within 15 days after the primary election or nominating convention. This statement must be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., and is a little different in form from that which is required in the first statement. The gentleman from Illinois and myself submit herewith as a suitable form for use by the candidate, in our judgment, the following:

(To be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., within 15 days after the date of the primary election or nominating convention. The depositing of this statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, duly stamped and registered, within the time above required, is a sufficient filing of the statement.)

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF CANDIDATE FOR NOMINATION FOR REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS.

(For filing after primary election or nominating convention.)

I hereby certify that the following is a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by me or by anyone for me with my knowledge and consent from any source, not included in the statement heretofore filed by me with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part, in aid or support of my candidacy for the ——— nomination for Representative in the Congress of the United States from the ——— congressional district of the State of ———, at the primary election (nominating convention) to be held in said district on the ——— day of ———, 1912, viz:

Also, that the following is a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by me, or by my agent, representative, or other person for or in my behalf with my knowledge or consent, not included in the statement heretofore filed by me with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, together with the names of those to whom such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring my nomination at such primary election (nominating convention) not including any money expended by me to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which I reside or for my necessary personal expenses incurred for myself alone, for travel, subsistence, stationery, postage, or writing or printing (other than in newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, or for telegraph and telephone service, viz:

Also, that the following is a correct summary of the statement made and filed by me with the Clerk of the House of Representatives prior to said primary election (nominating convention) as required by law, viz:

Also, that the following is a correct statement of every promise or pledge made by me or by anyone for me with my knowledge and consent or to whom I have given authority to make such promise or pledge relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in a county, State, or the Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in my candidacy as aforesaid, together with the names, addresses, and occupation of the respective persons to whom such promises or pledges have been made, and a description of the respective positions relating to which such promises or pledges have been made, viz:

(Cross out if promise has been made.)

I further certify that no promise or pledge has been made by me, or by anyone for me with my knowledge or consent or to whom I have given authority to make such promise or pledge, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in a county, State, or the Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or any person in my candidacy as aforesaid.

NOMINATION FOR CONGRESS.

Statement of receipts and expenses of ——— ———, ——— district of ———.
Primary or convention, ———, 1912.
Mailed ———, 1912.
Received and filed ———, 1912.

Both the statement which is required to be filed before the primary election or nominating convention and the statement which is required to be filed after the primary election or nominating convention must be sworn to or affirmed before an officer who is authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the State in which the candidate resides and shall be sworn to or affirmed by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative in Congress. If, however, at the time of said primary election or nominating convention said candidate shall be in attendance upon the House of Representatives as a Member thereof he may, at his election, verify said statement before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the District of Columbia.

The law further provides that the depositing of either of said statements in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, duly stamped and registered, within the time required herein shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

The law provides also that no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election any sum in the aggregate in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, use, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides. Provided, that no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum in the aggregate exceeding five thousand ($5,000) dollars in any campaign for nomination and election.

The publicity act further provides that no money that may be expended by any candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing—other than in newspapers—distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section, nor shall it be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statement required to be filed.

The statute directs that no candidate for Representative in Congress shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or any person, in his candidacy.

I have called attention to the provisions of the publicity act as far as they are applicable to the statement which is required to be made immediately preceding the primary election or nominating convention, and the statement required to be made after the primary election or nominating convention, and I hope that these suggestions may be of use and profit to the membership of this House.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted—
To Mr. HINDS, indefinitely, on account of illness.
To Mr. HEALD, for five days, on account of illness.
To Mr. BROWN, for one week, on account of illness in family.
To Mr. MORRISON, for one week, on account of important business.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of House bill 21477, being a bill entitled "A bill making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes"; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21477, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE]. Is there objection to the request for general debate? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21477, the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 21477. A bill making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope not to consume all of the time that has been reserved to me, and I will ask that I may proceed without interruption until I have made the brief statement that I propose to make touching the provisions in the bill, when I will be glad to reply to any questions that Members may wish to ask concerning the measure.

The bill carries $26,262,520.50 in cash and authorization, which is the smallest aggregate of any similar measure brought into this House since that of 1894. The bill of that year, as introduced, carried $9,431,689.56, but that of 1896, the largest up to that time in the history of the country, reached the sum of $62,051,000. From then on they range in amounts all the way from $83,816,138, carried by the bill of 1907, the largest ever considered by this body, down to $31,409,224, the aggregate of that of 1911.

The conservatism which resulted in the small amount carried by this bill was made advisable, in the opinion of the committee, on account of Treasury conditions and a consequent desire to keep the aggregate down to the lowest amount possible, at the same time providing adequate funds to carry on the various projects demanding attention until the next river and harbor bill shall have been enacted into law, and was made possible by reason of the policy of annual bills inaugurated two years ago.

Under that system it is in most cases only necessary to appropriate an amount sufficient to maintain the work, in case of maintenance, or to prosecute a project under way for a year. Sometimes, as in the present instance, only for a period of eight or nine months. At the same time it enables the engineers the better to estimate the amount necessary to prosecute the work on a project for the ensuing year and to furnish a safe guide to the committee in the consideration of a bill. Such estimates were made by the engineers and were followed by the committee in the preparation of the pending measure, their advice being freely sought wherever doubts arose in the minds of the committee during its deliberations. In only a few instances have the recommendations for cash appropriations made by the engineers been increased. In these few cases the increase was made necessary on account of changed conditions, the committee ascertaining that for one cause or another the estimates, as furnished by the engineers, were too small. Among these few are the Delaware River below Philadelphia; St. Johns River, Fla.; and Winyah Bay, S. C. But we have not in any case exceeded the cash estimates and authorizations combined where continuing contracts were recommended, of which there are quite a number in the Book of Estimates.

It will be seen, however, that there is only one provided for in this bill, and that for the Ohio River. It was declared in the bill of 1910, when the 9-foot project for the Ohio River was finally adopted, that the improvement should be completed in 12 years—meaning, as I understand, that at least the appropriations for its completion should all be made within that time—and although the engineers had recommended for this bill a cash appropriation of $3,200,000, they further suggested an authorization of $5,300,000. But after consultation the committee found that, without any detriment to the work or the plan for its completion within the time fixed in the act of 1910, they could easily get along with an authorization, in addition to the cash recommendation, of $2,200,000, which we have given. I wish it distinctly understood, however—and in saying this I but voice the sentiment of the entire committee—that in thus reducing the amount recommended for contract authorization we did not intend to abandon the plan for the completion of this great work within the time specified.

In fixing the amount for each item, whether relating to an existing or a new project, the committee has had in mind the fact that only eight or nine months will elapse before another bill will be presented and enacted into law, which must be done not later than the 4th of March of next year, when additional funds can and doubtless will be provided for each uncompleted project or such as can not be completed with funds heretofore authorized. Then, too, projects not now considered, whether on account of the necessity for conservatism in the matter of appropriations or for other reasons, may be again presented to the committee and through it to Congress.

We have not considered favorably all the projects that have been heretofore submitted to Congress or to this committee. When we began the preparation of this bill we found something like 135 new projects awaiting consideration by the committee and by Congress, the whole aggregating something like $65,000,000. Of this number we have only taken care of 54 in the pending measure, but the amount involved is much more than the aggregate of those remaining, some 85 in number. That is to say, while we have considered favorably only a little more than one-third of the relatively recent projects now before Congress, the amount recommended to complete the 54 adopted constitutes nearly two-thirds of the whole. We have, for instance, adopted projects the appropriations for which, however, are small, amounting to something like $41,000,000, leaving only about $24,000,000 now before Congress yet to be considered.

In selecting those embraced within the bill we have been governed entirely by the urgency and relative importance of the projects considered from the standpoint of the commerce, either present or prospective, to be accommodated, and believe that we have made few, if any, mistakes. Certainly I may assure this body that the committee has endeavored to select wisely, intending, of course, to give further consideration to the projects omitted from the present measure in the preparation of the next bill. In the consideration of this, as in those which have preceded it, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have treated each individual project alone upon its merits without regard to section, locality, or outside pressure of any kind.

And right here it may not be improper to advert to criticisms leveled at the River and Harbor Committee and at Congress, not so frequently of late, however, as in years gone by, that these bills are pork-barrel measures; that the log-rolling element enters into their consideration. This charge, whenever or wherever made, is entirely unjust and without foundation. No project has ever been adopted within the range of my experience and observation as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, covering a period of 16 years, for any other reason than that of the commercial advantages to accrue to the country from the doing of the work called for in the project considered. [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, during this time we have provided for hundreds of projects, involving an expenditure of $323,000,000 and ranging all the way from those of greater magnitude, like the harbors of New York and Boston and long stretches of river like the Mississippi and the Ohio, to small streams and less pretentious harbors; but whether great or small the only thought has been the commerce to be benefited by the money appropriated or authorized. If, incidentally, Members were pleased or constituencies gratified, so much the better; but these considerations did not, and have not, influenced us in the adoption of projects or in determining the amounts appropriated therefor. Let me further say, Mr. Chairman, that we have done the best we could in the selection of the items which have gone into this bill and in fixing the amounts appropriated or authorized, and if there is anyone who sees, or think he sees, ground for criticism now is the time to raise his voice or else hereafter hold his peace. We trust we are able to defend successfully every item in this bill, and invite the closest scrutiny of any and all its provisions. [Applause.]

Still another criticism of river and harbor bills has been that small streams and insignificant harbors are cared for and money unwisely spent thereon. In the first place, I want to say that in none of the bills to which I have referred have the amounts appropriated for such projects been large, but in each case the commerce to be benefited has amply justified the expenditure. There are purely intrastate rivers—indeed, streams wholly within a single county—which accommodate commerce originating on or near their banks and which is carried on their waters to railroad terminals or to the ocean and thence to other States, and even to far-distant lands. These are as much interstate streams and are as much entitled, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to Federal aid and care as though they traversed half a dozen or a dozen States. Then, too, in point of commercial importance they compare favorably with many of these longer and more pretentious streams. Some of them, considering the relative cost of improvement, are even of more importance, carrying—in proportion to the money expended on them—many times the commerce borne on the larger and longer streams.

There is yet another criticism, not so often used nowadays, still occasionally suggested, that the States represented on the committee are better treated than those not so represented; that the former get the larger amounts of appropriations recommended by the committee. The latter statement is perhaps true, but if so it is because their commercial importance justifies the consideration given them. There are 19 States directly represented on this committee. These constitute a little more than one-third of the States of the Union, but they have at least three-fourths of our coast line, more than three-fourths of the harbors and mileage of the navigable rivers, as also 90 per cent of the water-borne commerce of the country. So that, if they receive more they are entitled to more, and deserve all the attention given them.

The measure contains 261 items of appropriation. Of these, 102 are for the continuation of work on existing projects, 54 for new projects, and 105 for maintenance. For the 102 existing projects the bill carries $20,588,000; for the new, $4,477,070.50; and for maintenance, only $1,197,450. I say only $1,197,450, because, in my judgment, this is a small sum for that purpose, and makes a very creditable showing. Indeed, it speaks eloquently for the skill and ability of the engineers under whose direction the rivers and harbors of this country have been improved, at an expenditure up to the present time of more than $627,000,000. The engineering skill which during more than three-quarters of a century could expend that large sum of money on the improvement of the waterways of this country and at the same time do their work so efficiently that only a little more than a million dollars is necessary in the present bill to maintain all their work makes indeed a creditable showing. Indeed, it evidences the fact that they have done their work wisely and well. [Applause.]

In addition to the projects before Congress at the time this bill was prepared, and for which provision has not been made therein, there were something like 190 surveys still before the engineers upon which reports had not been made. Some of these may have come in since the introduction of this measure, and sooner or later all of them will be here, either with or without favorable recommendation. To those favorably reported to Congress we, of course, will give due consideration and adopt or reject them according to their individual merits, but in order to give a project a status before the River and Harbor Committee it is necessary for it to come there with a favorable recommendation from the engineers. This is a rule of the committee, not formally adopted to be sure, but one sanctioned by time and by the practice of the committee for several years. That policy has met with some criticism by a few, and doubtless will be criticized again, but I think a moment's reflection will show its wisdom.

The engineers who pass upon these projects go into and investigate the localities where a work is proposed, not only with a view to determining its advisability but for the purpose of making estimates as to the cost of the project. While they are on the ground they must necessarily familiarize themselves with conditions there, including the commercial advantages likely to accrue from the adoption and the completion of the project, and hence become well qualified to pass upon the advisability of doing a given piece of work.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Florida yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Would the gentleman mind waiting for a while? I would prefer to finish my statement, then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. GARRETT. Very well.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, again, Mr. Chairman, if we were once to abandon this rule, which I admit is an arbitrary one—if we once got away from it, I fear that the criticism to which I referred a moment ago—that the river and harbor bill is a pork-barrel measure—could be made with some show of justice, as we would then likely be overwhelmed with all kinds of projects, and without some safe rule to guide us might be the victim of combinations, which would destroy or make difficult this class of legislation. So it seems to me that for the present at least we must adhere to that rule. Whether we can get away from it in the future, whether we can devise some other or better plan for the giving of a status to a project before our committee in the preparation of river and harbor bills, remains to be seen.

Among the projects which we have inserted and provided for in this bill are the Missouri River below Kansas City at a cost when completed of $20,000,000; the Tennessee River, to cost $6,700,000; the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., to cost $5,400,000; Sabine Pass, Tenn., $2,000,000; and the construction of a large new lock in the St. Marys River at the falls at a cost of $3,275,000. Although these sums are large it is hoped that each of the projects may be completed within a reasonable time, for while the existing commerce on some of these waterways is small at present as compared with that on a few other streams in this country, it is believed that their completion in accordance with the projects adopted will result immediately in a large commerce upon each of them and that benefits entirely commensurate with the outlay will result to the country at large. The resources of the areas contiguous to these waterways and the rapid development of the sections through which they run seem to justify this expectation.

The project for the further improvement of the falls in St. Marys River may be said to stand in a class by itself, it being one of the most important arteries of commerce in the whole country. It already accommodates a large freight tonnage. For the year 1911 the commercial statistics furnished by the engineers show a total of 62,363,218 tons going over this river, an increase of 30,817,112 tons since 1904, and from all appearances this tonnage will continue to increase rapidly for several years to come.

The great industrial interests depending upon this enormous commerce and the damage that would result from any serious delay in its passage to points of destination made the committee unwilling to take any chances of freight congestion at these falls which ample lock facilities might prevent. Hence, it was though best to provide in this bill for the construction of another large lock alongside of the one now being built, and to wait until this lock is completed before beginning the enlargement of the Poe Lock, as suggested by some of the engineers. The committee was influenced in the course taken in the present bill and to construct the larger lock by the Chief of Engineers, who not only recommended this course in his report to Congress, but adhered to the same in an interview had with him by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, he being of the opinion that the building of the new lock is much the wiser course.

It will be seen that the bill contains quite a number of items where projects have been adopted, subject to conditions set forth in the reports of the engineers recommending such projects. These recommendations usually take the shape of local participation; that is, that the localities or parties immediately interested contribute something toward the prosecution of the improvement. Occasionally the recommendation is that the right of way, where such is desired, be furnished, or that terminal facilities to a given extent be afforded. The proportions thus recommended to be contributed by localities range all the way from one-fifth to one-half of the amount estimated to complete the projects, respectively, and are based on advantages especially accruing either to individuals or to the localities where the commerce is more local than general.

In this connection I wish to call attention to provisions in the bill extending the scope of the investigations heretofore required of the engineers in preliminary and other examinations and the reports thereon. Among these are inquiries into both private and public terminals—transfer and dock facilities contiguous to the waterways or harbors to be improved. This is a subject the importance of which can not be overrated. One of the most serious handicaps to water transportation heretofore existing has been the lack of dock facilities within the reach of everyone and at reasonable rates to all desiring to use the waterway in question. The tendency had been for many years toward the ownership and control of such facilities by railroads, or by them and steamship companies acting in conjunction, a practice not conducive to competition in freight carriage or to the cheap handling of freight. The result has been in many instances to almost destroy transportation by water, as it is impossible for private enterprise to compete, in the face of such drawbacks, with railroad transportation or combinations of railroads and steamship lines. This is a condition which does not exist in European countries, as the various governments abroad exercise a greater degree of control over railroads than has heretofore been exercised in the United States; and this, I may say, furnishes an important reason, if not the chief one, for the greater use of the waterways of Europe than is made of those in this country. A change, however, is now taking place here. But while many communities, including several of the larger cities, have awakened to the importance of freeing commerce from this handicap by municipal or other public ownership or control of dock and terminal facilities, much remains to be done. Legislation to remedy this will, perhaps, be necessary, but, before undertaking, such information not now in the possession of Congress is needed, and it is the purpose of the provision to which I have just referred to furnish this information.

The plan adopted in this and in the two preceding bills of fixing a time limit for the completion of some of the larger projects should be commended. The spasmodic, haphazard way in which work had been carried on before by reason of insufficient appropriations caused parties inclined to use waterways to hesitate in making the necessary arrangements, as there could be no certainty as to when the improvement would be finished and the waterway in a condition for use. Such a provision in a measure commits Congress to the plan and practically insures continuance of the appropriations necessary for its completion within the time limit. Of course no one Congress can in this way irrevocably commit another to a given plan in the matter of waterway improvement, but the tendency is in that direction, and I have no doubt but that in each case Congress will continue the appropriations from year to year until the projects so undertaken are completed. Indeed, acting in response to a strong public sentiment in that direction, I feel confident that Congress will furnish the money necessary to complete all the projects now under way and in sight, whether large or small, as early as is practicable and without the discouraging delays which have heretofore retarded the growth and development of the commerce depending upon waterway and harbor improvement. [Applause.]

There is one important project adopted in the present bill with a time limit of 10 years for its completion—that for the Missouri River below Kansas City. It is proper, however, to add that the bills of 1910 and 1911 carried amounts for this stretch of the river aggregating $1,600,000, which have been used or will be expended in the completion of that project, so that with the sum provided in this bill there only remains of the original amount $18,400,000 to be provided in future bills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not covered all the provisions of this bill and the limited time at my disposal will not permit me to do so, but I wish to ask the indulgence of the House a little longer.

This is one of the most important measures that has been brought or will be introduced into the House during the present session. This the people understand, and there is throughout the country to-day a greater interest manifested in favor of river and harbor improvement than ever before in our history. They have found that the railroads are unable to do all the carrying business of the country; they have seen that, although the development of these transportation agencies has gone on until their trackage reaches 240,000 miles, with the very best equipment in the world, with all that trackage and this superior equipment they are unable to do the business required of them, except in favored localities. [Applause.]

The people, accustomed for nearly three-quarters of a century to rely upon the railroads, have found them falling below the demands made upon the transportation energy of the country, and that if the development of our resources is to go on and our surplus products distributed to the consuming populations of this and other countries, our harbors must be deepened, our rivers further improved, and canals constructed wherever such may be made to serve a useful purpose; and there are several such places throughout the country—localities where comparatively narrow stretches of land may be traversed and navigable waters, either of lake and river or ocean and gulf connected. The necessity for this class of improvement was never so great as now, because the development of our resources was never so pronounced as at this time. There is scarcely a locality, north, south, east, or west, that is not feeling the touch of this spirit of development and progress. Lands hitherto lying idle, localities heretofore neglected, resources up to this time disregarded, are now being developed so that all our transportation facilities—wagon and railroad, river and harbor, supplemented by artificial waterways—will soon be required, indeed, are now demanded.

Mr. Chairman, we hear much of tariff and other forms of taxation, and they are a necessity, else government—national, State, county, and municipal—can not go on. The tax burdens for these purposes are heavy, but not nearly so great as the transportation tax by wagon, rail, and water in the United States. These, it is estimated, are more than two and one-half times greater than the former. The people are taxed, so it is said, $2,000,000,000 a year to support the various governmental agencies—Federal, State, county, and municipal—and more than $5,000,000,000 for transportation by the three methods just mentioned—wagon, rail, and water—so that there is no greater problem confronting the American people to-day than that of transportation, and into the settling of this problem two things at least enter—efficiency and cost. The people are interested in both. Efficiency, because on that depends safety and dispatch in the transportation of person and property. Cost, because on the transportation charges depends largely the profits of him who uses the transportation facilities. Improved waterways not only add materially to these facilities, but they are great regulators of freight and passenger rates, of which all the people receive the benefit, some more than others, perhaps, but each and all reap to a certain degree, directly or indirectly, a benefit from the lowering of rates by the increase of water transportation facilities. Hence, I repeat: There is not a more important measure claiming the attention of this body than the rivers and harbors bill. Having for its purpose the development of our numerous harbors and the improvement of the 25,000 miles of navigable waterways now being used, together with the 25,000 more miles of rivers that may be easily made navigable, and all to the end that ample transportation facilities may be furnished to the people in so far as these can be furnished by this class of development, its importance can not be overestimated.

Mr. Chairman, I said this is a most important measure, and it is. But it is more. It is also the most popular of any introduced or that will be introduced into this House. The people, of course, recognize that the great supply bills for the carrying on of the Government must be passed. They tolerate the naval appropriation bill, which provides for the battleships—those powerful engines of destruction—and the military appropriation bill, which keeps up the Army to a standard of efficiency, because, forsooth, some time in the future they may be needed for purposes of defense. War may come, an enemy may menace, yet these are happily uncertain and, we hope, remote possibilities. But we know that the development of our resources is going on, that our commerce is increasing, and that the necessity is ever present for transportation facilities to accommodate its growth and development. Wars we would prevent, but commercial growth we would encourage. The one brings prosperity and happiness, the other sorrow and adversity. All this the people understand; hence the popularity of this class of legislation, and they will brook no delay nor tolerate any backward step along that line. And, let me say, no one will reflect the wishes of his constituents by opposition to a measure fraught with the possibilities for good with which these measures are laden. And, Mr. Chairman, we are making commendable headway. Only a few years—10 or 15 at most—will be necessary at the present rate of progress to do all the river and harbor work now in sight. The last three bills, including the present, averaged about $38,000,000. But suppose we should for the next decade and a half average a smaller sum than that—thirty or thirty-five millions, for instance—even then one can readily see that nearly a half billion of dollars will have been appropriated by Congress. Add to that the sum of nearly $700,000,000 which has been appropriated since the Federal Government took charge of river and harbor work, and we get an aggregate of nearly $1,200,000,000, an amount greater than that expended by any other government in the civilized world. No country in Europe or elsewhere will have done so much, and none will have a greater mileage of navigable waterways or a greater number of first-class harbors than ours. [Applause.]

The amount above suggested will be sufficient to complete not only the improvements in the Mississippi River and its tributaries, embracing projects amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, but the amount will be sufficient to take care of all the projects now in sight, including the intracoastal waterways, or such of them as Congress may see proper to adopt. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Four or five minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have spent at least two and a half months in the preparation of this bill. We have had numerous hearings by persons representing different sections of the country, including boards of trade, some coming even from the Pacific coast. To them we have accorded patient hearings, and have given to this bill the most careful consideration possible. We therefore hope and believe we have presented a measure that will not only meet with the approval of this House, but that of the country as well. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman; the measure before the House is one that vitally affects the great industrial and commercial activities of the whole country. Based upon principles of statesmanship, a policy of internal improvement, reaching the vast areas covered by the appropriations contemplated by this bill, will inevitably lead to the increased prosperity of our people and the rapid growth of our common country. These appropriations will be applied, if this bill becomes a law, to the coastal improvements along the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the Gulf of Mexico, the Great Lakes, and those great arteries of trade and commerce that carry upon their bosoms the great wealth of the country that teems in the inland reaches of our great continent. No Nation on earth can equal in volume, variety, and richness the mighty commerce that annually traverses our great country over its lakes, along its rivers, on its great railroads, and upon its coasts.

The expenditure carried by this bill, regulated by a scrupulous regard for a commendable policy of economy, will amply meet the demands and immediate needs of the country. It is not so much the magnitude of the appropriation that counts, in my opinion, as the application and distribution of the moneys. If the moneys appropriated are devoted to those points, and applied for those purposes solely which made for true internal improvement, then they will be wisely expended, and industrial success and commercial prosperity must follow as surely as the night follows the day. But if the moneys are applied to the promotion of railway policies in such a way as to render competition between railways and waterways either impracticable or impossible, then industrial and commercial stagnation will follow, and our country will continue to be at the mercy of the great trunk lines of the country as far as our inland facilities for transportation are concerned.

Experts who have studied the cost of transportation hold that the expense by rail is in the ratio of 6 to 1. If this is true, the proportion in the rates of traffic charges should logically be the same. And if this proportion is not maintained, then there must be some artificial, extraneous influence that creates the burdens of which the shippers complain and against which we hear such loud and persistent complaints. The purpose of waterborne traffic is twofold; first, the reduction in the rates of transportation; and, secondly, the perfection of the transportation facilities by water so that no inland community of the country will suffer in its commercial activity and prosperity because of its remoteness from the great ports of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I believe with the chairman of this committee that this is one of the most important bills that this Congress will be called upon to pass. I am in favor of the passage of the bill, not because the State of Illinois or the city of Chicago that I in part represent have any particular interest in the passage of this bill.

Mr. CONRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Certainly.

Mr. CONRY. Will the gentleman state why it is that in this bill there is no appropriation made for the city of Chicago?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Because Congress, on March 3, 1899, passed an order for a survey of the Chicago Harbor and waters in and about Chicago. That report is now in the hands of the Board of Engineers of the Army and has not as yet been submitted to Congress, and we have had no opportunity to pass upon what Chicago is asking for in the way of harbor improvement. I may state that Chicago is preparing to build an outer harbor, and we do expect an appropriation from the Federal Government to assist us in extending the breakwater for the Chicago Harbor. And being a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I can positively assert that when these preliminary reports are submitted by the War Department and the estimates prepared the great city of Chicago will assuredly receive that generous treatment to which, by reason of her greatness, her influence, and her power, she is justly entitled. [Applause.]

In the great city of Chicago we have facilities for inland and outer water transportation that is exceeded by no city in the country. Her position on the Great Lakes, her geographical situation, her rivers, canals, and her great possibilities as a commercial center should make her the leading city of the Nation from the standpoint of water-borne traffic; while in reality she actually occupies the fifth place. She is the second great city of the country. She has profited very little by Federal aid. Her greatness is the product of the genius, the push, and the energy of her enterprising and ambitious sons.

While the Congress of the Nation has been liberal even to the point of lavishness in appropriations for other sections, the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois have been continually ignored. This fact and these conditions have been forcibly exhibited in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information in response to Senate resolution of December 7, 1911, relative to expenditures for rivers and harbors. This letter, as printed in the Chicago Examiner, shows the total amount appropriated in the State of Illinois for river and harbor improvements was $8,520,924.81. Of this sum $2,740,663 was applied to the Chicago Harbor.

In glaring contrast to the smallness of these appropriations are the amounts devoted to internal improvements of other States, as shown by the following table:

Michigan	$43,494,495.87
New York	41,925,351.80
Texas	24,382,529.60
Massachusetts	17,284,368.53
Ohio	16,211,109.78
California	14,605,144.12
Georgia	12,373,856.71
Wisconsin	11,493,944.17
Florida	11,205,058.28

This niggardly treatment of the city of Chicago by the National Government can be more keenly appreciated when we consider the lavish display of generosity made by this Nation to individual projects as shown by these appropriations:

Philadelphia	$15,465,529.22
Boston	10,402,687.45
Galveston	9,316,934.72
Detroit River	9,700,283.05
Patapsco River, Md	4,453,347.98
Great Kanawha River, W. Va	4,257,863.14
Cape Fear River, N. C	4,760,993.71
St. Johns River	4,813,003.75

The outer harbor of the city of Chicago is susceptible of wonderful development, a development that means greater commerce, greater power, and greater influence for the metropolis of the West, and greater prosperity for the whole country. She is to-day the distributing center for the wealth-increasing products of the great West. Her spirit of enterprise keeps abreast of the increasing demands of the age. And she is now contemplating an expenditure of $5,000,000 in the construction of an outer harbor on the lake shore and the expenditure of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 for the construction of the most modern types of bridge over the Chicago River to facilitate traffic.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. The gentleman is a resident of Chicago?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. What effect has the Chicago Drainage Canal on the level of the lake?

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is an old question which has been up here in several forms for some time. We have just had a hearing upon it. The effect of diverting the water, we contend, makes no difference in the lake levels whatever. We believe that the health of the people of Chicago is paramount to the interests of navigation, and inasmuch as it makes no perceptible difference in the water levels of the lake, we believe that we are entitled to that extra supply of water for sanitary purposes. [Applause.]

I am heartily in favor of the development of these improvements upon the Chicago River and all its branches. Just as sidetracks are necessary to the development and perfection of a great railroad system, so is the improvement of all the branches of a great river essential to its proper development as an agency in the commercial progress of a city upon its banks. Where a stream is improved there is more water-borne traffic along that stream and the consequent development of great industrial plants upon its shores. Every such improvement will open up the avenues of trade and will bring to the doors of the individual enterprises that line the rivers the fleets laden with wealth that ply from lake to lake and port to port. Increased traffic by water does not hamper railroad business but actually aids and helps to build it up.

If river and harbor improvements are to continue to meet with popular approval, if they are to justify the noble purposes which gave them birth, the policy governing them should be based upon the broad principle of our country's good. No discrimination against this enterprise or that enterprise should be tolerated. Let every enterprise participate alike in this great scheme of governmental activity. Let every development of a harbor, inland and outer, provide for terminals for the reception of traffic by water. I am unequivocally in favor of this principle and this policy. It is the only just policy and the only wise policy. Any other policy will retard the development of our commerce and will ultimately bring into disrepute the great and noble work to which our Government is committed, and which it has contributed so generously to sustain and perfect; because it is just as imperative for our water-traffic systems to have terminals, and they are just as essential to their efficiency as are depots and railway stations along the lines of our great railroad systems; and it therefore becomes the duty of the Government to establish these terminals now, for it is only a question of time when the needs and necessities for our inland commerce will enforce their construction. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill carries in appropriations and in continuing contracts a little over $26,000,000, which is made up, as the chairman of the committee has told you, of these items: For maintenance, $1,197,450; for the carrying on of works now in progress, $20,588,000; and for entirely new work, $4,477,070.50. It is the smallest bill that has been reported to the House from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors since I have been a member of that committee; but in entire frankness it should be said that the bill does commit Congress to new projects which will ultimately call for the expenditure of a very large amount of money. The committee has worked faithfully and long upon the bill. Through the fortunes of political warfare I have found myself at the foot of the table and a distinguished Democrat now sits at its head. I wish to say that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], as chairman of the committee, has always shown himself to be courteous and able; he has not been actuated by sectional or political considerations, but he has at all times endeavored to do his best for the progress and development of our whole country. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is a well-considered piece of legislation, and I urge that it be passed by the House as it has come from the committee. We have adhered strictly, as I understand it, to the policy of the committee—that no items should be included in a bill upon which there have been adverse reports by the engineers. The committee has not formally adopted a rule that no projects shall go into a bill which have not had the approval of the engineers, but it has become, fortunately for river and harbor legislation, the established practice of the committee. If you are going to include in river and harbor bills projects which have been turned down by the local engineer, by the division engineer, by the board of review, and by the Chief of Engineers, then you will indeed have a pork barrel; and then you will sound the knell of river and harbor legislation [applause], for you will have river and harbor bills that no Congress should pass and that, if passed by Congress, no self-respecting President could sign. We laid the basis for such practice in the bill of 1902, which provided that all new projects should first be considered by a local engineer and passed upon by his division engineer; that they should then be considered by the board of review, which consists of five high officers of our Corps of Engineers, and finally passed upon by the Chief of Engineers. Formerly reports of the engineers had great weight, but it was in 1902 that legislation on this subject was strengthened. I am going to quote from an address made by Gen. William H. Bixby before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, in which he spoke most interestingly upon the education and training of engineer officers and showed why it is that they are so well fitted for river and harbor work:

THE EDUCATION OF ENGINEER OFFICERS.

Those who have not specially studied the subject may occasionally wonder how and why the river and harbor work ever came to be assigned to the Army engineers.

During colonial days there was little work anywhere of engineering nature in the United States except what could be done by the ordinary farmer and mechanic. In the days of the American Revolution the military and topographical engineer came to the front as a military necessity. In 1800 James McHenry, Secretary of War, urging the re-establishment by law of a Military Academy and a Corps of Engineers, said, in his argument, that "fortifications is but a single branch of their profession" and "their utility extends to almost every department of war and every description of general offices, besides embracing whatever respects public buildings, roads, bridges, canals, and all such work of civil nature." In 1802 the Military Academy was established at West Point for the sole purpose of educating engineers for such service.

However, at present only from 5 to 10 per cent of the West Point graduates, those who appear best fitted for such special work, join the Engineer Corps, the others going to the other branches of the military service.

The United States Coast Survey was organized in 1816 by F. R. Hassler, a former Military Academy professor, being later extensively developed by A. D. Bache, a Military Academy engineer officer graduate of 1825. Many of the great topographical, geodetical, and astronomical surveys of the United States were originally organized by Army engineers, or at least by West Point graduates.

Up to 1824 West Point was the only school which taught civil engineering, and all engineering work was necessarily started under the guidance of West Point graduates. In 1824 a specific act of Congress gave to the Army engineers the definite charge of all Government roads and canals.

The Rensselaer Polytechnic School did not start until about 1824, and the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale and the Lawrence Scientific School at Harvard not till about 1847. When, after the Civil War, civil engineering and other technological schools began to develop all over the United States, the Military Academy graduates still held their own good standing in the civil-engineering profession because of their added knowledge of governmental methods and their special training. Our engineer officers have been liberalized by constant contact with other parts of the country and other business interests, although independent thereof, concerned only with securing good engineering work and the public benefit, and thereby specially fitted for the duties assigned them by existing law.

I think it is due to the corps which I represent that I put these matters thus simply and plainly before you, so that you may know just why the Army engineers already have the suport of the Federal Congress and why they expect to have that of your congress as regards not only our past river and harbor work, but also that of the future.

Our system of training and executive organization is very similar to that of France, where every officer in charge of river and harbor work (with but few special exceptions) must pass through three years of mathematical and civil engineering study in their War Department Polytechnic School and then three more years of special engineering study in the Government School of Bridges and Highways, after which their district officers are directed and supervised in much the same way as in the United States. And France is noted throughout the entire world, as well as in Europe, for the extent, thoroughness, and perfection of its river and harbor improvements.

Large appropriations are needed for the development of our rivers and harbors, but, in by judgment, we need a more definite policy and businesslike methods still more, and that is what we have been working for. There is no man in the country, in my judgment, who has done more in that direction than has our present Chief of Engineers, Gen. Bixby. [Applause.] So, Mr. Chairman, in this bill we have followed consistently the practice of following the recommendations of the engineers. There is not an item here, so far as I know, which is adversely reported upon by the engineers. I know that there are some Members of the House who feel that we follow too closely the reports of the engineers and that we ought to act more upon our own judgments. It may be that in time this practice may be somewhat modified, especially as to the commercial features, but I do not believe that it is wise to make any change at the present time. For some time, at least, we should pay such attention to the reports of our engineers. Such a policy will make annual bills a certainty, and there is no other way by which we shall make more certain the fact that river and harbor appropriations are investments from which the people of our country derive great benefit. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE].

[Mr. DONOHOE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word with reference to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE], who, we understand, is going to deprive us of his company against our desire and against our will. He is now the ranking Republican on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and has been the ranking Republican when there was a Republican chairman of that committee. I know that I express the unanimous opinion of both sides of the House when I say that it will be with the profound regret of the membership of this House that he leaves his service in Congress. [Applause.] The Rivers and Harbors Committee, while one of the most important committees of the House, has never been a partisan committee, but it has had a tremendous amount of work to perform and has had an exceeding great influence on the development of the country, because without the improvements which have been made in the rivers and harbors of the country the development of commerce which we have witnessed in recent years would have been impossible; and in the work of that committee for many years past there has been no member who has more completely held the confidence of the Members on both sides of the House, working along with other able and distinguished members of the committee, than has the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE]. [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent, Mr. MANN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, we have listened with pleasure to the remarks of the minority leader, in which he has paid a high and merited compliment to the splendid ability and sterling worth of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Massachusetts. While we differ in politics, yet I am sure ever Member of the House, whether Democrat or Republican, has heard with regret that Mr. LAWRENCE, who has served so long and so well upon the committee on Rivers and Harbors, has announced that he will not again seek a seat in this House.

We shall miss him in the House and on the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the bill will become a law without amendment. It carries many millions less than any general river and harbor bill has carried in the history of waterway legislation in this country.

To improve the waterways for navigation means competition to the railroads, which in turn means cheaper freight rates to the people. It means to develop the resources and commerce of the country.

Some are simple enough to believe the demagogue when he charges that improving the waterways is of no benefit to the farmers. They are the ones who are benefited more than any others by opening up water transportation, in order that the freight rates on their products as well as upon fertilizers and other freights may be reduced.

A cotton farmer residing in middle Georgia, in talking to me recently about the appropriations to improve the Savannah River, stated that he was satisfied that the saving to him annually on freight rates on account of improved river navigation would amount to at least $100. This is one of many cases that could be cited along this line.

The Government is committed to the policy of improving the waterways. I think the time has come when the National Government should also enter upon a policy of improving the highways under State control and through State cooperation. It would result in untold blessings and would be of inestimable benefit to the people of the country.

If we wish to solve the railroad question and the question of high freight rates it would seem to me that it can be done effectively by improving our waterways and our highways. It is my opinion that such work will make for the material development of our country and will result in great good to the people.

Georgia has been well cared for by the committee in preparing this bill. I hope that all the Georgia items will remain in the bill and that it will become a law, in order that the great work contemplated may proceed at the earliest possible date.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything, but I believe I shall submit just a few statements in reference to the bill. The very common criticism of river and harbor bills—a criticism I may say that is always confined to those who are not handicapped with any information on the subject, and who therefore can speak fluently—is that we waste money in appropriating for insignificant streams and creeks.

I just wanted to call the attention of the committee and the country to the fact that in this bill, which is no exception to the rule which has prevailed for many years, the appropriation for creeks when compared to the tonnage carried on the creeks is the best spent money perhaps of all. For instance, in this bill there are $129,500 carried for creeks, and these creeks bear 6,750,000 tons of commerce valued at $218,000,000, and, although I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I will venture the guess that in five years after the Panama Canal has been opened it will not float much more American tonnage in any one year than is borne on the creeks that are provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAWRENCE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MURRAY. Five minutes or three minutes—as much time as the gentleman can yield me.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, in spite of the fact that I do not happen to be a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I may yet with some grace rise to second the statement of the minority leader, Mr. MANN, of Illinois, with respect to the ranking member of that committee, my colleague from Massachusetts, GEORGE P. LAWRENCE. [Applause.]

We have known him in our Commonwealth as GEORGE "POPULAR" LAWRENCE ever since the time, some years ago, when a wise man who knew that Mr. LAWRENCE was highly esteemed by our citizens, suggested that his middle initial must stand for "Popular."

He came to this House of Representatives after distinguished service in our Commonwealth, where he presided with great dignity for a period of nearly 10 years over one of our courts and later presided with equal dignity during the last two years of five terms' service in our State senate.

We who live in Boston, at the eastern end of the State and far removed from that western section of Massachusetts which he has represented now for more than 14 years, have profited by his service here, because we have had many appropriations for our harbor that have come largely as a result of his active efforts in the making up of river and harbor appropriation bills.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this bill may be adopted as it has been reported by the committee. I know something of the careful attention that has been given by the chairman and the members of the committee in the preparation of this bill, for I appeared before the committee and frequently conferred with its members about items of importance to Massachusetts.

The items in the bill that are of particular interest to the people of Greater Boston are found on the second and third pages of the bill, as follows:

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass., by dredging the channel of Chelsea Creek in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 272, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $85,000.

Improving harbor at Lynn, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

Improving Maiden River, Mass.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 77, Sixty-second Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $80,000.

Improving Mystic River, Mass.: Continuing improvement below the mouth of Island End River, $50,000.

We are especially interested, too, in the item that authorizes the Secretary of War to cause preliminary examinations and surveys at Boston Harbor, Beverly Harbor, Gloucester Harbor, and Merrimac River.

We hope to secure for Boston Harbor an increased width and depth in the channel from President Road to the sea and to provide deep-water connection with such suitable terminals as may be established by the directors of the port of Boston.

These directors of the port of Boston are public officials of our Commonwealth, Mr. Chairman, whose offices were created by chapter 748 of the Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts, 1911.

They have been given broad powers as the administrative officers of our port, and an appropriation of $9,000,000 has been authorized to meet the expenses that may be incurred under the provisions of the act.

Mr. Chairman, I am mindful of the fact that vast sums have already been appropriated by this Government for river and harbor improvements. We have appropriated—

For rivers and harbors, by States	$328,107,378.66
For general and joint improvements not separable by States	285,763,827.32
For canals, exclusive of the Panama Canal	13,227,030.07
Total, exclusive of Panama Canal	627,098,236.05
For the Panama Canal	241,165,945.53
Total, including the Panama Canal	868,264,181.58

I know full well that of this vast amount the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been favored with no small share of the whole. I have considered carefully the full significance of the following table that shows the details of the expenditures within our State:

Bass River	$20,150.34
Beverly Harbor	35,015.00
Boston Harbor	10,402,687.45
Buzzards Bay Harbor	2,500.00
Canapitset Channel	5,312.54
Chatham Harbor	15,971.36
Cohasset Harbor	10,000.00
Dorchester Bay and Neponset River	94,584.55
Duxbury Harbor	32,000.00
East Dennis Breakwater	7.57
Edgartown Harbor	25,000.00
Essex River	30,000.00
Fall River Harbor	235,412.00
Gloucester Harbor	494,979.67
Hingham Harbor	29,000.00
Hyannis Harbor	167,158.47
Hyannis and Nantucket Harbors	116,861.11
Ipswich River	5,617.91
Kingston Harbor	8,940.00
Lynn Harbor	335,437.00
Malden River	10,000.00
Manchester Harbor	23,985.57
Marblehead Harbor	833.42
Marthas Vineyard Harbor	5,000.00
Merrimac River	366,466.72
Mystic River	50,000.00
Mystic and Malden Rivers	240,021.10
Nantucket Harbor	349,424.12
New Bedford Harbor	167,734.64
New Bedford and Fairhaven Harbors	302,000.00
Newburyport Harbor	412,000.00
Powow River	50,940.72
Plymouth Harbor	258,626.74
Plymouth and Provincetown Harbors	38,718.06
Provincetown Harbor	$156,452.97
Rockport Harbor	22,000.00
Salem Harbor	63,868.66
Sandy Bay (Cape Ann) Harbor and Breakwater	1,751,229.25
Scituate Harbor	104,590.98
Taunton River	201,950.21
Town River	18,000.00
Vineyard Haven Harbor	55,387.35
Wareham Harbor	95,997.30
Wellfleet Harbor	11,365.57
Westport Harbor	3,000.00
Weymouth River	60,500.00
Weymouth and Town Rivers	82,327.41
Winthrop Harbor	9,000.00
Woods Hole Channel and Harbor	306,582.68
Total	17,284,638.53

I call attention to the fact, however, that our citizens have authorized within the year an appropriation that is more than half the total expenditure of the National Government for our State during all the years of its activity in river and harbor work.

I believe that the passage of the pending measure will encourage our citizens to continue their policy of local expenditures, and I, therefore, hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in commendation of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and of its able chairman, who is in charge of this bill on the floor, that I have received the most courteous treatment in all such matters as I have had before them, and I believe that every Member of this House who has been before that committee would bear the same testimony. I heartily concur in what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in praise of the ranking Member on the minority side [Mr. LAWRENCE], who, judging from the remarks made, will shortly retire from the committee and from Congress. While my acquaintance with him has not been of sufficient duration to speak of him with the familiarity that the gentleman from Illinois has done, yet I can say that in my few personal contacts with him I have found him to be gentlemanly, kind, and obliging, and I believe that his long and efficient service is worthy of all that has been said in his favor.

This bill carries for the improvement of that great channel of trade, the Ohio River, which borders for 300 miles or more along the State which I have the honor to represent, in part, a direct appropriation of $3,200,000 for continuing the improvement thereof, and in addition thereto authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for further improvement to the extent of $2,200,000, making a total of $5,400,000.

It further carries an appropriation of $200,000 for the improvement and maintenance by open-channel work on said river. In addition to the said sums there will be carried in the sundry civil bill $1,200,000 for this river, which makes a grand total of $6,800,000 to be appropriated by this Congress for the improvement of that stream. When it is considered that the total of this bill is but twenty-seven millions it will be readily seen that the people of the State of West Virginia and of other States bordering upon the Ohio River have no just cause for complaint against the action of Congress in this respect. Probably three-fourths of the amount appropriated will be spent within the borders of West Virginia, because it must be remembered that that State wholly owns the Ohio River along its border to the low-water mark on the opposite side. This ownership grows out of the term of the original cession by the State of Virginia to the National Government of that great area known as the Northwest Territory.

It is likewise a source of congratulation to the whole Nation that the Congress shows this spirit of liberality to that great highway, because the territory tributary thereto is unquestionably the richest in agricultural products and the products of manufacture, the great sources of national wealth in the whole wide world. I have not time to speak, as I would be glad to do, of the great resources, the transportation of which would be advanced by the projected 9-foot stage in the Ohio River. I will, however, say that the statistics show that the States along the Ohio River, together with Wisconsin and Michigan, which latter two are largely tributary thereto, produce more than one-third of the corn raised in this country and about one-fourth of all produced in the world, and they produce other grains and crops in almost the same large proportion, so far as the United States are concerned. I had the extreme pleasure of accompanying the committee from Pittsburgh to Cairo by way of the Ohio River, and returning through the interior of the States bordering on the said river, last summer. And I verily believe I saw, even in the unprecedented dry season then prevailing, green fields of waving grain sufficient to feed this Nation for a year.

For many years there has been an agitation for the improvement of the Little Kanawha River, which lies wholly in my district. Many years ago a private corporation erected four locks and dams upon that river, and about the year 1882 the Government appropriated a sum for the further improvement of that stream, and additional appropriations were made from time to time until in the year 1891 an additional lock and dam was completed, which extended the improvement to a distance of about 55 miles above its mouth at Parkersburg on the Ohio River. Subsequently the Government purchased the four locks owned by the private company, so that the whole of the improvement became the property of the Government. This river is susceptible of improvement for many miles farther, but with all the diligence and energy of the several Congressmen who have represented that district since 1891—and I here say for my predecessors that they have been diligent and energetic, doing all in their power in the premises—they, as well as myself, have been confronted with adverse reports from the Board of Engineers, and the head of navigation on that stream still remains at the point where it was on December 2, 1891, when the additional lock to which I have referred was opened for navigation. Perhaps the projects heretofore advanced have been too expensive—based upon a system of larger locks than are advisable for that stream in the views of the engineers. One project involved the expenditure of over $5,000,000, and as to that an adverse report was made by the division engineer on February 8, 1910. Subsequently it was resubmitted upon a project, costing about $1,500,000, as to which the division engineer reported under date of May 25, 1911, that he deemed the said river not worthy of improvement at that time. The committee, after giving full consideration to these reports, has declined to make an appropriation in the present bill.

I have no criticism for their action, because it could not be expected that, in the face of these reports, they would make an appropriation of Government money without some further investigation. They have, however, embodied in their bill a direction to the Secretary of War for further examination and survey, if necessary, to ascertain the head of practicable navigation, with a view to the improvement of the river as far as they think the Government would be warranted in undertaking. When this bill comes up for amendment I propose to ask the House to provide in the bill for the examination and report upon a large tributary of the Little Kanawha River, called Hughes River, which has its mouth within the bounds of the present limits of the improvement and which, in my opinion, is worthy of improvement, as the benefits to be derived therefrom by the farming element of that section far exceed the small cost which will be incurred by the Government in the proposed extension. I trust that the chairman of the committee will not oppose this amendment when the time comes for me to offer it.

While I feel disappointed that the committee could not give what I thought ought to be appropriated for the Little Kanawha River, yet in view of the great benefits to be derived from the further improvement of the Ohio River, I shall, as my predecessors have been compelled to do, swallow my grief and vote for this bill as reported. I am inclined to think that no district in the country has fared better under this bill than mine, when the Ohio River improvement is considered and consideration is also given to the fact that most of this appropriation will be expended within the lines of that district. At least such is my information, which information, while unofficial, I believe to be authentic.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I may now be excused if I ask for a reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SCULLY].

Mr. SCULLY. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and I earnestly hope that it will pass without one dissenting vote. As a new Member of this House I am unequivocally in favor of the development and improvement of the waterways of this country. While I have at all times been a strong believer in the development and improvement of the waterways of the entire Nation, yet I am particularly interested in the development and improvement of the waterways of the State of New Jersey. My assignment to that great and powerful Committee on Rivers and Harbors gave to New Jersey for the first time in the history of Congress representation on that committee. Naturally, as a new Member of the House, it is with considerable satisfaction and great pleasure that I welcome this bill to the House. New Jersey has too long been neglected in the river and harbor bills, and it is about time that Congress should learn of the inadequate care bestowed upon the rivers and harbors of that great State.

Of the Atlantic seaboard States, New Jersey is twelfth in area, fifth in population, and fourth in manufactures, and in the matter of actual importance of waterway is second to none in the entire Union; yet we find that care, widening, deepening, and general improvement of waterways have been only meagerly provided for.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, and it must to the committee, that when the tremendous importance of the navigable waterways in New Jersey is considered, that their neglect has been nothing short of shameful and shows an inertia on the part of Congress. Rivers and harbors far inland, which never felt the throb of a steamer or even the buzz of a motor boat, have had millions lavished on them, while my State has had but paltry and inadequate sums. The result has been, Mr. Chairman, to throw sections of that State that should be prosperous manufacturing and shipping sections into stagnation and to place important existing cities at the mercy of railroad monopolies, charging exorbitant freight rates.

To-day, as never before, is the subject of water communication of interest to the public. The people of the district which I have the honor to represent have waited patiently for many years for this much-needed improvement, and they will no doubt be greatly pleased to learn that their labors have not been in vain. New Jersey is well provided for in this bill, new projects adopted, improvements, and maintenance amounting in the aggregate to about $1,000,000, being about one-fifth of the total amount which the Federal Government has expended on the waterways in New Jersey from the establishment of the Government, as is shown by the following statement, prepared and submitted by Hon. Franklin MacVeagh, Secretary of the Treasury:

Statement of expenditures for river and harbor improvements, including canals, from the establishment of the Government to the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911.

There are many projects in my State not provided for in this bill, due to the fact that the report of the United States engineers has not as yet been transmitted to Congress. I hope they will be taken care of in the next bill and speedily completed.

No State, in proportion to population, has done more to develop its waterways than has New Jersey. That State is now engaged in constructing a waterway, at its own expense, along the coast from Cape May to Bay Head, a distance of about 100 miles. This waterway will be not less than 6 feet deep at low tide. It will connect all of the important seaside resorts along the coast and will be of tremendous value to the farmer and manufacturer. The State is committed to the projected deeper waterway, or ship canal, across the State. Such a canal would materially decrease freight rates, and would mean an increase in shipment and afford an adequate market for the products of both farm and factory. The legislature has also authorized the appointment of a commission to buy the right of way for the proposed canal between Raritan Bay and the Delaware River, with the intention that the State shall present the site to the United States Government whenever Congress shall signify its intention to construct the canal. The commission has been appointed and has begun its work, and an appropriation of $500,000 has been made to carry out the work.

The report of the Commissioner of Corporations on transportation by water in the United States in part says:

"Our increasing commerce demands that our waterways shall be made an active part of our transportation system. Our inland rivers are not so now. Waterways themselves and their conditions must be so improved that they shall carry a share of the Nation's traffic proportioned to their real possibilities, and shall so supplement the rail system as to prevent the recurrence of disastrous traffic congestions. Waterway traffic has its inexorable limitations. Waterways also have their enormous possibilities. If, guided by the facts, we direct our attention to those lines of effort where success is possible, we shall utilize these possibilities.

"Our coast line is over 5,700 miles, or, with the indentations of the coast, over 64,000 miles. The Great Lakes shore line of the United States is 2,760 miles, or, with the indentations, 4,329. These lakes are connected with each other, and by canals with the Atlantic Ocean, St. Lawrence River, and the Mississippi River, there being, however, a channel of but 14 feet depth to the St. Lawrence, and this through Canadian territory, 7 feet to the Atlantic through the Erie Canal, and a still less depth to the Mississippi.

"There are over 290 streams in the country used to a substantial degree for navigation, with an approximate navigable mileage of 26,400, but with very little direct connection with each other except the Mississippi system.

"About 4,500 miles of canals have been constructed. More than one-half—2,444 miles, costing over $80,000,000—has been abandoned. State canals, however, still operate in New York, Ohio, Illinois, and Louisiana, with a total mileage of nearly 1,360, and there are also 16 private canals of some importance in operation, with a total mileage of 632.

"Transportation by water now suffers from one far-reaching disadvantage which we can largely remedy, namely, the lack of organization of our waterway system as a whole. At present we can hardly be said to have a general waterway system. Our great total mileage of waterways is split up by certain physical characteristics into a number of largely unrelated parts. Part of the waterways consists of ocean routes of unrestricted depth and width. Part consists of lake routes of unrestricted depth, except in certain very important connecting channels. The rest consists of river and canal channels of varying and always restricted depth, of narrow width, devious courses, and with more or less current and obstructions. Most of the rivers are navigable at present only for light-draft boats. At ordinary stages of water about 40 streams have a total of at least 2,600 miles of 10-foot navigation; 70 streams, including parts of some of the 40 mentioned, give about 3,200 miles additional from 6 to 10 feet, a total of 5,800 miles of river navigation of 6 feet and over. But, again, these totals do not mean that there are any such continuous stretches of inland waterways of these respective depths. Very few of the Atlantic rivers have more than 100 miles of a depth of 6 feet. The Mississippi system has about 2,500 miles of 6-foot navigation.

"Our canals also are largely disconnected with one another, and of varying depths. Excluding the short Government canals, like the St. Marys Falls Canal, there are 13 miles of canals in operation with 10 feet depth, about 1,200 miles of 6 to 10 feet (mostly 6), and about 750 miles of 4 to 6 feet depth.

"Our interior waterways are indeed largely disconnected. But added to this is also a great difference in vessels using them, so that they are not generally "interchangeable" over different waterways. For example, on the Mississippi the shallow depth and the constant backing and turning at the innumerable bends make the stern-wheel paddle the only method generally successful; and, on the other hand, this latter is, of course, wholly unsuited for the open sea. Again, naval architects assert that, even were the large-bulk freighters of the Lakes brought to tidewater, it would be preferable and almost necessary to transship there; that these freighters are not adapted to ocean conditions.

"Vessels differ still further according to the nature of the freight. Many are adapted for a given traffic only. There are grain, ore, coal, fruit, lumber, and oil vessels. This applies especially to bulk freight. Much more than three-fourths of the traffic on the Mississippi system is carried in bulk by barges and rafts. Over 80 per cent of the Great Lakes business is bulk traffic. A very important part of the coastwise traffic, especially coal, is bulk cargo.

"Such vessels are thus usually confined to routes where such freight is offered.

"A great part of the country's traffic is through freight. Our waterways are now divided by differences in channels, etc., and by diversity in floating equipment. The rail system of the country is standardized, physically unified, and its control is largely centralized. It is well adapted to handle such through freight. A share, at least, of this through freight is essential for the success of either system. There has been bitter competition between rail and river lines. But the inland water system, divided and disorganized by the conditions described, is greatly handicapped, especially as to through traffic.

"Under a general plan, our inland waterways can be made much more of a commercial unit. They must be placed in such a position that they can secure, even against rail competition, a far greater proportion than now of the country's traffic. River and canal traffic is now insignificant as compared with rail traffic.

"We must, of course, recognize that no reasonable expenditure will wholly remove these difficulties. For instance, it is probable that transshipment from rail to water, or from one water carrier to another, will continue to be necessary on most long inland or partly inland hauls. Transshipment means terminals. Part III of this report, now in preparation, will take up the question of terminals in detail. It has had far too little attention in the past. It is sufficient to say now that terminal improvement is greatly needed and is entirely possible.

"Since 1870 a general policy of Federal waterway improvement has been followed. The total Federal appropriations for inland river improvements up to 1907 have been over $250,000,000. There has been very little cooperation between the central and local authorities. This has resulted in inevitable lack of uniformity and of comprehensive plan, and in the lack of any proportionate contribution from the localities peculiarly benefited. European countries have in many cases distributed the costs of waterway improvements upon localities in some ratio with the special benefits received. Such cooperation is worthy of careful consideration in any comprehensive plan of waterway improvement.

"The report sets forth certain general facts as to floating equipment, company organization, finance, legal conditions, etc. The total gross tonnage of documented vessels in the domestic trade in 1896 was 3,858,927 tons; in 1906, 5,735,483 tons, a gain of 48 per cent. American vessels in the foreign trade, whose tonnage reached its maximum in 1860, declined until 1898. Between 1896 and 1906 there was an increase of only 11 per cent in this latter tonnage. Steam has largely superseded sail power, and its proportionate tonnage is steadily increasing. The Atlantic and Gulf coasts are the most important districts, with nearly half the total documented tonnage. The Great Lakes have more than one-third of that total tonnage, and almost half the total documented steam tonnage. On the coasts and the Great Lakes there has been a marked increase in the size of vessels, bringing about there a reduction in transportation costs.

"Corporations control the great proportion of the steam tonnage, particularly the larger vessels. In 1906 the average size of vessels owned by individuals was 113 tons; by firms, 223; and by corporations, 526. There was also a proportionate increase of corporate ownership of barge lines, and even of sailing vessels, though not so marked as with steamers. There has been a recent tendency toward consolidation of many lines under single corporations. The control of steamer and barge lines will be discussed in a later part.

"The returns to the bureau as to earnings and expenses were highly unsatisfactory. Only a few rough conclusions can be drawn therefrom. Operating expenses averaged, for the companies making returns, about 80 per cent of the gross earnings, the lowest ratio of operating costs being that of the bulk-cargo vessels of the Great Lakes. The highest ratio is that of the packet lines on the Mississippi system and southern rivers.

WATERWAYS AND THEIR IMPROVEMENT.

"The possibilities of transportation by water in the United States may be roughly indicated by a brief survey of the extent of its waterways.

COAST LINE.

"The Atlantic coast line of the United States is more than 2,000 miles in length, and it is extended for a little over 1,850 miles more by the Gulf of Mexico. The Pacific coast line is more than 1,800 miles long. The coast line of continental

United States aggregates 5,705 miles. This is increased to a meandered length of 64,604 miles by including the numerous indentations, many of which provide important bay, sound, and inlet routes. Chief of these are the Gulf of Maine (so called), Long Island Sound, Delaware Bay, and Chesapeake Bay, on the Atlantic coast, and Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast.

GREAT LAKES.

"Next in significance are the Great Lakes, the most important group of inland waterways in the world. Their shore line in United States territory is 2,760 geographical miles. In the meandered length there is 4,329 miles. They are connected by a series of natural and artificial channels. Canals also connect the Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, but these are not of dimensions to permit of through navigation by large vessels. Another series of canals, constructed by the Canadian Government along the St. Lawrence River, give 14 feet draft to Montreal, and are used to some extent by American vessels.

"On the coasts the Government has deepened harbors and connecting channels. Similar works on the Great Lakes give a depth of 20 feet on the main channels at mean water level.

COAST AND LAKE ROUTES.

"The coastwise trade routes radiate mainly from a few central ports, such as Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, on the Atlantic coast, and San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle, on the Pacific. On the Lakes, notwithstanding the large number of routes, the great movement of traffic follows a few well-defined main lines. Most important is the route from Lake Superior ports across Lake Huron to Lake Erie ports. Another main route, formerly the most important, is that from Lake Michigan ports to ports on Lake Erie.

RIVERS.

"The number of navigable streams used to a considerable extent for commercial purposes in the United States is about 295, with an approximate mileage of 26,400."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. LOBECK addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. DYER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. BARCHFELD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Boothbay Harbor, Me.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 82, Sixty-second Congress, first session, $18,000.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I regret very much I was unavoidably absent on business at the Navy Department a few moments ago when the bill H. R. 21214 was passed, known as the special excise-tax bill. If I had been present I would have voted for the bill. I have no objection to the present bill under consideration, as I find that North Carolina has been well provided for in this bill. I regret very much to say, Mr. Chairman, that this House can not find time nor does it seem inclined to make an appropriation for one of the most important interests affecting this country, namely, the public highways of the country. I know that a great majority of this body, both upon the Republican and Democratic sides, favor national aid for public roads. But it seems that it is impossible to get a bill reported for that purpose. I think that if either political party would propose a bill granting national aid for public highways and provide for a vote in this House, that that party would receive the plaudits of the American people.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for just a moment to oppose the pro forma amendment. I have listened with much interest to the gentleman from North Carolina when he so earnestly expressed his satisfaction for the provision for North Carolina. Just what the item means for the extension of the inland canal in North Carolina I am not perfectly clear about, because I have not read the engineer's report. But I tell you that if we had old ocean within a stone's throw of the Middle West we could get along without such a 6-foot channel as that which starts up somewhere in New England and runs to Galveston.

I want to compliment the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER], coming as he does from the State in which I was born. I was not to blame for that, nor am I to be complimented for it. In arms I was carried over the mountains to Indiana. I am proud of the old North State and I am glad to have been born there. But after that great contest for State rights and local self-government during the War for the Union, I am surprised that the gentleman desires one of the great parties to succeed in order that it may enter upon a system for improving the public highways of the country from the National Treasury. We have only 60,000 miles of black-dirt highways in Illinois, not a very large number. Thank God, while I am not called a Democrat, I am a better Democrat for the preservation of local self-government and for the control of local affairs than one who seeks to enter upon the improvement of all the highways in all the States and administer that improvement from the Public Treasury, and centralize and dominate that improvement, stretching 3,000 miles from one ocean to the other, as the area of the United States does. And God knows how many millions of miles of public highways we have. If the party of which I am a member favored this policy, which is to further centralize this Government and divorce the sovereign—90,000,000 in number—men, women, and children from looking after their own local interests, and put that plank in the platform, I would never indorse it.

I just wanted to say this much. I wonder how men within the sound of my voice could mistakingly fight for what they call local self-government for four long years and then stand without protest and sit without protest and listen to such a doctrine. I say, again, so far as local self-government is concerned, believing in a national government, the United States, wherever it has jurisdiction under the Constitution, is a Nation with a big "N." Still, I will, just so far as I have voice and vote, insist upon the 47 sovereign States, where they have jurisdiction, exercising that jurisdiction, instead of subverting a wise policy of letting each government, the National Government on the one hand and the State governments on the other hand, remain strong governments, each exercising its functions within its jurisdiction. [Applause.]

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I have no apology to make for my position favoring national aid for public roads. I have said, and I do not wish to take that statement back, that if the membership of this House could be forced to vote upon this question national aid to public roads would be granted in the Sixty-second Congress.

Why, Mr. Chairman, every mail route in this country uses the public roads for the transportation of the mails. Then why should not the National Government assist in keeping up the same. If you transport the mails over the railroads, you pay the railroads for that purpose. Then why should not the National Government assist the people in keeping up the public roads over which the mails pass?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GUDGER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is in favor of building highways out of the Federal Treasury, and I wonder if he will be in favor of extending the highways to the city streets all over the Union. They are all post roads.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, you do not even work the streets of a municipal corporation under the State laws. They are provided for by the municipalities.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; they are under State law.

Mr. GUDGER. If it is just, give the cities a proportion of this money. The cities of this country get all the appropriations for public buildings. The great waterways of this country receive annually large appropriations, amounting to millions of dollars during the last 50 years, but when the common people, the people of the rural districts, come up and ask for an appropriation to assist them to make more valuable their property by building great public highways, then there is an objection on the part of some people to the effect that it will destroy local self-government.

Why, my friend Mr. CANNON talks about being from North Carolina. When he was born in North Carolina he was born in one of the greatest States of this country. [Applause.] It is great in times of peace and her people heroic in times of war. North Carolina needs no defense at my hands. In 1861, when this country went to war, North Carolina, from that date to 1865, furnished more soldiers for the Confederacy than there were voters in that great State. North Carolina lost more men during that war than any other State, according to its population, and she justly holds the record of being "First at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, and last at Appomattox." When the war was over and peace declared she went to work to build up the waste places and came back into the Union as one of the great States. Therefore she needs no defense at my hands. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was born in North Carolina. I only regret that he left the State and that he is not a great Democrat.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Cooper Creek, N. J.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 1, strike out the word "Creek" and insert in lieu thereof the words "River (Creek)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving channel from Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay, Fla.: Continuing improvement, $70,000.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement made by Mr. Andrew Furuseth in relation to anti-injunction legislation now pending in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

STATEMENT OF MR. ANDREW FURUSETH—HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, 1906.

"Mr. FURUSETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let it be clear in the minds of this committee and of Congress that labor, organized or unorganized, does not ask for the destruction of the injunction as it rightly applies to the protection of property. We do protest against and resent the perversion of the equity power, glaring examples of which you have here in your records.

"You seek our reasons for asking legislation to restrain judicial abuses of the equity power in labor disputes. I am commissioned by laboring men to present some of their reasons. We feel strongly on this question. You have had it under consideration for years, and before this committee makes any recommendations to the House I want to make suggestions which I believe go to the bottom of this subject.

"The one-man power to enjoin, to forbid, to legislate, except as used by the fathers, was, we think, first conferred upon the Roman tribunes, elected for one year, and to be used to protect the plebeians against the patricians. This power was absolute and irresponsible. The person of the tribune was made sacred. Contempt of him or violations of him were punished by death. The tribune, having been clothed with absolute and irresponsible power to forbid, it was soon understood that this included powers to command, and the tribunician power created the Roman Emperor. The powers of the Emperor, who in his person represented and exercised all the authority of the people, made him sovereign. These powers were resurrected and conferred upon Carl the Great, the first Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire of the Middle Ages.

"As absolutism developed as freedom lost to the people, the kings assumed, in theory and in fact, the powers which had been vested in the emperors of the old Empire—they became sovereigns. The power to forbid—to legislate—was vested in the king. He was sovereign, and by virtue of his sovereignty could and did rule by command or proclamation. Under the name of equity this absolute power was adopted into our system, but only in the form and for the purpose then used in England. It was conferred upon our Federal judges, who are appointed for life. We suffer under the misuse of this power. We believe that it has been unduly extended. We come to you to submit our complaint, and it is not that the judges have not power enough, but that they are exercising powers which we believe they have not. We fear this power; we feel its results. From what we have seen we believe it capable of infinite extension, when permitted to go beyond the boundary set at its adoption into our system. I shall now endeavor to state why we fear it and what reasons we think we have for this feeling.

"Any condition of society, no matter how produced, which condition prevents a healthy family life, is destructive of humanity and should be resisted.

"The condition may be inherent in the system; it may have been artificially created by legislation or by judicial decisions. In either case it is man's sacred duty to insist upon such changes or remedies as shall put within reach of the industrious father the power to support a family in health.

"The energies of existing society are devoted to the production of wealth for sale. The struggle between individual firms, communities, and nations is to produce wealth so cheaply as to be able to undersell any other.

"To be the workshop of the world was the ambition of England of the Manchester School of Economics. To accomplish this land, machinery, and labor had to be brought to the lowest figure and skill to the highest. Land and machinery bought for the lowest figures and held in private ownership were conceived to be the most economical, and the question was how to get the cheapest possible labor. The workers must have sufficient wages for subsistence and reproduction.

"Under the old system of production labor had been needed especially on the land, and it had therefore been tied to each manor by registration, and its wages determined by judges sitting in quarter sessions under the statute of laborers. The concentration brought about by factory production made the old system costly, hence inconvenient, and the registration in manors and the statute of laborers were repealed. The laborers, however, remained on the land in too great numbers, and they were needed in the factories. When needed on the land they were tied to the land. Now, when needed in the factories they were driven from the land. The first condition of getting labor cheap is to so arrange that it becomes plentiful and dependent, hence the razing of old English villages and the driving of the workers into the cities, where, landless and homeless, they must work for such wages as the employers should be willing to pay.

"But as wages must be sufficient for sustenance and reproduction, the cost of food became all important. For generations England had maintained a protective tariff on foodstuff in the interest of the landowner. The factory owner wanted cheap food in order to get cheap labor, and between the two interests arose a fierce struggle, which ended in the present system of free trade in foodstuffs. Under the existing system of land tenure and prices farming became unprofitable, tilled land was turned into pastures, and more laborers were driven into the cities to bid against those already there. Thus followed further reduction in wages and a still further lowering of the standard of living. It came to a condition in which the husband, working 16 hours per day, was utterly unable to provide for the family. Children were compelled to work in the dusty atmosphere of the factories for 14 to 16 hours per day; their physical development was arrested; their mental and moral development became impossible. Still lower wages and standards had to go, and mothers were compelled by bitter need to work underground, doing work now done by mules, steam, or electricity, or to stand on their feet tending machines until it often happened that they were taken with labor pains at their work.

"Labor, voiceless, homeless, and hungry, had been made so cheap that its very cheapness was destroying its efficiency and threatening its extinction.

"Laborers resisted to the best of their ability, but leaving one master who was bad often meant going to another who was worse. If one or more men quit there were others to take their places; quitting work singly was no remedy, since it could not interfere with production by stopping machinery. They then joined together in unions—voluntary associations—based upon the right of quitting work individually. As subjects they had the same rights as other subjects—freedom of locomotion, of speech, of the press, and of assembly. Assuming that they did not lose these rights by laboring for a living, they assembled, they discussed their grievances, they printed them in pamphlets, books, and papers. They appealed to others to join with them, and determined to refuse to labor until their worst grievances should be remedied, and found that while the statute of laborers had been repealed, the conspiracy law, based upon this statute, was, acccording to the rulings of the judges, still in force, and they were punished for doing as workingmen what they as subjects had a full right to do.

"They did not give up, although they found themselves thus punished; combinations to raise wages being forbidden, they still combined; notwithstanding traitors in their own ranks, they struggled onward. They punished their traitors as deliberately as did the old Germans in their Fehm-Gericht. They were executed or transported for having acted as judges and executioners, but they still persisted. They could but partly stay the inevitable downward trend; but at last it became evident that wages must be sufficient for sustenance and reproduction, and legislators were compelled to pass laws legalizing collective action and curtailing the power of the judiciary.

"The trade-union acts were passed and the conspiracy law was amended, so that men in England might use their rights as subjects to defend their interests as workers. How many men were driven from their families, executed, or transported, to what extent the race was crippled, before relief came from legislative depression of the wage rate or judicial usurpation in the interest of cheap labor, we can only surmise. But it came at last, thanks to the bitter and determined struggle of the workers, assisted to some extent by humanitarians, chiefly members of England's old aristocracy.

"Not that the struggle there is won, but improvement has begun, and that it will continue and finally be won may reasonably be expected from the temper which could face prison and transportation in the past.

"The political, social, and industrial conditions of the United States have throughout been patterned upon those of England.

"Substantially our President has the power which was vested in the King of England at the time of the third George. Our Senate and House of Representatives are substantially the House of Lords and the House of Commons. We copied from England the common law, our system of jurisprudence, with the Bill of Rights and the powers of the judges. We adopted the English system of land tenure, entail excepted.

"Our industrial system is taken from England and has followed the English lines in its development—chattel slavery in some States, contract slavery in all at one time. Term contracts to labor were for long in common use in this country, and were transferable by inheritance or sale. They were recognized by the organic law, and one of its clauses provided for their enforcement. That this system did not in the earlier days of the Republic produce the same results as in England was due to the unlimited amount of land ready for squatters' occupation, and when the servitude became too galling the Indian country west of the Alleghenies lay open for settlement, safe from servitude and assured of sustenance.

"After the adoption of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution the enforcement of term contracts to labor was stopped in some Northern States, and such contracts ceased to be made. The individual workman could leave the employer with whom he was dissatisfied and seek another. The white worker's right of locomotion and of the absolute ownership in his own body became, except in one or two callings, recognized. The system of chattel slavery was destroyed, and an amendment to the Constitution forbidding its existence was adopted.

"With freedom to seek better conditions and with land yet plentiful, there were early marriages, large families, and a healthy people. There was no mournful cry of race suicide. But as land became settled or absorbed in individual ownership, and this outlet was stopped, city slums grew; low wages, long hours, and want became more and more common here. Wages went below the line of subsistence and reproduction, the number of marriages and of children decreased, while prostitution grew. This became so apparent that the census gave much attention to ascertain the extent of the condition. It was found to be worse than was suspected, and the talk of race suicide was heard—women standing on their feet until their capacity for motherhood was destroyed; children stunted in their physical and mental growth by work utterly unsuited to their age.

"Remedies more or less successful were suggested and tried. Here, as in England, men quit as individuals, but found the quitting ineffective. Here, as there, they came together in voluntary associations and quit work in unison until their grievances should be redressed, and in doing so found themselves violating statutes or judicial decisions designed purely to keep labor cheap. Constant agitation, repeated violations, and punishment gradually molded a public opinion that compelled a final recognition of men's right to quit work collectively—to strike. Statutes and decisions treating the strike as conspiracy were repealed or became obsolete.

"Men who had struck endeavored to persuade fellow workmen not to take their places—this in order to compel an adjustment of the trouble—and when adjustment did not follow, appeals were made to the public to cease giving patronage to the unfair firm—that is, they levied a boycott on the firm in question.

"Thus the two main weapons of organized labor came into use, and as they grew older and more systematic they became so effective that the employer was looking for some remedy, and, from out of the lumber room of the past, came the injunction, as it was when most abused by the court of star chamber—that is, it came as a proclamation by the court forbidding the workers to perform some specified or unspecified acts of which the employer complained on pain of being punished for contempt of court. This seems to be what the injunction is nowadays when used in labor disputes. It used to be 'a judicial process operating in personam and requiring the person to whom it was directed to do or refrain from doing particular things,' and this to protect property right.

"Like other parts of our judicial system, we have our injunctions from England. The King, by virtue of his absolute power—legislative, judicial, and executive—would be appealed to when someone was about to do something not forbidden by the law, yet which, if done, would cause great injury. Something needed to be protected; the law was insufficient; and, by virtue of his absolute power, the King could and did supply the remedy. Addressed to one subject, it was a royal command, if to many, a royal proclamation. In the first instance it was intended to protect the individual and in the second the community. As the law became more complete the need for such proclamations became less imperative, their places being taken by statute law or usage accepted as law; but, law and usage being general, in their application serious injury might happen to individuals; hence the royal power was more and more restricted to individual instances of injustice or injury.

"The King being too busy to sit in court to exercise his power, delegated it to his chancellor, and it grew apace until it came into serious conflict with the common law and the jury system. Its purpose being to prevent great wrong by forbidding the action which would cause such wrong, the penalty necessarily had to be swift and certain, and violation being a disobedience of the King's command—contempt of the King—and the facts being easily ascertained, punishment was immediate in operation and severe in kind. The royal power being irresponsible and absolute, it was necessarily misused by the individuals intrusted with its execution and their friends and had to be curtailed, circumscribed, and carefully guarded.

"There was a time when the court of star chamber was used in England, as our courts are now being used, to forbid the doing and then punish disobedience without trial by jury in any and every direction. Personal liberty was at the whim and caprice of this court. But the English people would not long tolerate any such use of the royal power. The people abolished the court of star chamber and compelled the King to sign the bill of rights.

"It became the fundamental principles of chancery, or equity, that—

"(1) It was to be exercised for the protection of property rights only.

"(2) 'He who would seek its aid must come with clean hands.'

"(3) 'There must be no adequate remedy at law.'

"(4) It must never be used to curtail personal rights.

"(5) It must not be used to punish crime.

"It was substantially in this shape that it was accepted by this country, ingrafted in our Constitution, and the power of its administration conferred upon our courts.

"Equity, law, and jurisdiction at that time had a specific meaning, and any extension in jurisdiction, any enlargement of scope, must come from the people through an amendment to the Constitution or there is judicial usurpation.

"If injunctions which nowadays are issued in disputes between employers and employees can stand the test of these principles, our complaint should be against the law; if they can not, then we have a just complaint against the judges who, either from ignorance or mistaken zeal for public order and cheap labor, misuse their power—act as a sovereign in issuing his proclamations.

"The fundamental principle of American law, as we understand it, is that there shall be no property rights in man. A man's labor power is part of him; it fluctuates with his health, decreases when he grows old, and ceases at his death. It can not be divorced from man, and therefore, under our system, can not be property. Property may be bought, sold, or destroyed without destroying the possessor thereof; it is the product of labor or of nature. Labor is an attribute of life, and through no system of legitimate reasoning can it be treated or denominated as property. An individual, a firm, or a corporation runs an enterprise for the production of some form of property. Through grant or purchase land has been obtained. Upon the land buildings have been erected and machinery installed, and to the plant has been brought the necessary raw material. These things are property, and, based upon its possession, contracts are entered into to furnish within a given time a stated amount of commodities.

"Giving this property in pawn, money is borrowed to pay operating expenses. But without labor these things will produce nothing. Labor is obtained and production begins. Being in business to make money, the company in question, assuming the producing concern to be a combine, first endeavors to find out how much of any given kind of work a man can do going at his highest capacity, and it begins the piecework. Prices are gradually reduced until the greatest capacity is ascertained, and that becomes the standard of production. Wages are gradually reduced until the labor of the husband can not sustain the family. The wife helps in any way she can, and the children are sent to the factory. Still the earnings are too small, and the wife goes there also. Wages are under the danger line, but are still going down. A poorer home—ragged and untaught children growing up as half savages. Young men and women see the situation and refrain from matrimony. Marriages and births are on the decline, and the rising generation is stunted.

"The laborers get together in voluntary association; that is, they use their freedom of assembly. They bring their grievances before the management, petition for redress of grievances. They are refused, and, to enforce their position, they use their right to quit work—use their freedom of locomotion. They publish the facts of the disagreement, the causes which led thereto; they induce, or endeavor to induce, other workers to make common cause with them—their right freely to print and publish. They are successful to such an extent that production is partially stopped. The company endeavors to get other men and the men on strike appeal to the public to refrain from purchasing commodities manufactured by the firm; they levy a boycott. They appeal to fellow workmen and the public to use their purchasing power to redress a grievance. Sales of stock on hand decrease and the company is unable to meet its obligations, fill its orders, or fulfill its contracts.

"The company then goes to some judge and appeals to him to use the equity process to protect what it calls its property. It sets forth that it has the land, the appliances, the raw material, and contracts to deliver goods; but, owing to a 'conspiracy' on the part of labor, it is unable to get workmen, and its property—that is, its business—is being destroyed. The judge takes the statement and issues an order forbidding the workmen 'to interfere with the business' of the firm. The workmen know that disobedience means imprisonment for contempt, and, disheartened and hopeless, they obey. The firm gets new men, its business moves again, but those at work must live in squalor, children must be laboring instead of at school, women must be in the factory instead of in the home. Home life is destroyed. Still fewer grow the marriages, still fewer the children. The equity process has been used so that homes are destroyed, women are made barren, and the coming generation of men are made unfit for their life work.

"Has any judge the right to use the equity power in this way? The workmen have used their constitutional rights as citizens—freedom of locomotion, of assembly, of speech, and the press. They have not destroyed any tangible property; they have neither interfered with nor threatened to interfere with any property. But the attorney for the plaintiff sets up the idea that the earning power of property is property; that is, business is property. The earning power of a plant depends upon labor and sales depend upon patronage. The firm can have no property right in labor, because that is inherent in the laborer and would mean property right in the laborer. The firm has no vested right in the patronage of the public. Patronage is the free act of the patron. Under our system it is a new doctrine that the ownership of a store carries with it a vested right in the patronage or that the ownership of a factory carries with it the vested right to so much labor and at such prices as will make it profitable. Such doctrine followed to its logical conclusion would destroy all personal liberty, transform existing society, and reestabish the feudal system.

"Do these men who are driving women into the factory and crippling the race come into court with clean hands?

"They seek the aid of equity to protect their financial and industrial interests, and yet they run their industry in such a way as to cause untold misery, destitution, and crime. Wages so low as to cripple or destroy the race. If their hands be clean, how must they act to be considered unclean?

"Injunctions, proclamations, used contrary to and destructive of constitutional guaranties of individual freedom, are usurpation, whether they take place in a monarchy by the king or in a republic by a judge. The power is the same, its results are the same, and a people that will endure become serfs, will deteriorate and die.

"Gentlemen, you have before you two bills dealing in different ways with injunctions. H. R. 4445—the present Wilson bill—by Mr. Little, of Arkansas. You have had this bill before you during several Congresses. You have had hearings on it, and, so far as has appeared at those hearings, this bill would, if enacted into law, put a stop to the use of injunctions in labor disputes. That the relations between laborers and their employers are personal relations, as distinct from property relations, that the rights of either party are personal rights, as distinct from property rights, will hardly be seriously disputed. If these are the true relations, then there is no occasion for the equity power to step in. We maintain that it is pure usurpation on part of the judge to so extend the powers granted to him as to cover labor disputes. We believe that by passing this bill you stop the usurpation and bring the law and the judges back to where it and they belong. Labor will be content with nothing less. Anything short of this robs the laborer, because he is a laborer, of his rights as a citizen.

"You have also before you H. R. 9328—the present Moon bill—'A bill to regulate the granting of restraining orders in certain cases,' by Mr. Gilbert, of Indiana. This bill, supposed to have had its origin in the White House and drawn in the Bureau of Corporations, confers upon the courts sitting in equity absolute jurisdiction in all cases 'involving or growing out of labor disputes.' The judge is to give the defendant a hearing, but may, as in any other suits at law, proceed if the defendant shall fail to appear. We have complained that the use made of the equity process in labor disputes is usurpation of a sovereignty not granted to the courts. It seems to us that in this bill the grant is about to be made.

"Sovereignty was partially, not wholly, delegated to the Federal Government; the States and the people are presumed to retain full powers of sovereignty. The judiciary has been permitted to claim title to and exercise an undefined authority by congressional tolerance—the absence of prohibitive statutes.

"Federal judges—I speak respectfully and by way of illustration—found a kind of 'legal public domain' upon which any daring squatter might locate. The judiciary entered, took possession, and this bill—9328—is apparently designed to establish their title in fee simple 'to have and to hold forever.'

"Labor disputes are controversies between employers and employees, and they involve the hours of labor, the wage to be paid, rules under which work is to be performed, the number of apprentices, and the qualifications of men at the work. Growing out of them are strikes, boycotts, the inducing of men to quit work or to refuse to go to work, and efforts to induce the public to cease buying the goods produced. The judge sitting in equity is given jurisdiction by this bill, we think, over all these relations. He is to investigate, to hear and determine, to act, in fact, as arbiter, and he is given the equity power with which to enforce his decree.

"If this be not the reenactment of the law giving to judges the power and making it their duty to set the wages as at the quarter sessions after hearing both sides, what is it? The Romans conferred this absolute and irresponsible power on a tribune, elected for one year, in order that he should use it to protect the weak against the strong. Are we going to give it to our judges, appointed for life, to be used by the strong against the weak? The English gave it to their judges to use in the interest of landed proprietors against the raise of wages caused by the black death. Thorald Rodgers, in his Six Centuries of Work and Wages, has told us the result.

"Why can you not trust the judges, somebody asks? We do trust them. They are to use this power to stop strikes. When they have to choose between giving the award in favor of the employer who seeks to reduce wages or to have him stop, as he threatens, the business which gives employment to thousands, and thereby throw them out of work, his very humanity, as he feels it, will decide the award. It will be downward, downward, and downward, as under the law of the quarter sessions. It is said that his bill has the indorsement of the President. That can not be. If he understands this bill and then gives to it his indorsement, he is an enemy to honest labor struggling under adverse conditions for a better life—nay, he would be an enemy to human liberty. We do not believe, will not believe, it.

"In the labor movement, as well as in all walks of life, there are differences of opinion, divergent perspectives.

"Organized labor demands an anti-injunction law that will absolutely limit the power of judges when they deal with controversies growing out of labor disputes, not a law that will be used as a compulsory arbitration act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Oklawaha River, Fla.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance from the mouth to Leesburg, including Silver Springs Run, $15,000: Provided, That such part of this sum and of the amount now available as is necessary may be expended for maintenance of levels in the lakes at the head of the stream as provided for by the act approved June 25, 1910, or in such further improvement of the stream as may be recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As to this item on page 20, with reference to improving the Oklawaha River, in Florida, it provides that money may be expended for the maintenance of levels in the lakes at the head of the stream, as provided for by the act approved June 25, 1910, or in such further improvement of the stream as may be recommended by the Chief of Engineers. What is the project there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the project contemplates the putting in of a relatively inexpensive lock and dam—one that will cost only about $25,000. The purpose is to maintain the levels of the lakes above the dam. By putting in the dam the levels will be maintained, and by putting in the lock commerce will not be impeded. But the main purpose is to maintain the lake levels. It was feared by the engineers that if the river was deepened in that locality it would cause the water to run off so fast that the levels of the lakes above would be materially reduced.

Mr. MANN. I think that reduction of the levels would be a very desirable thing to accomplish. A large share of the State of Florida is composed of lakes, which, if drained, would be of some value. Here is a proposition to spend money to keep the land from being drained where it ought to be drained. In one end of Florida the gentleman proposes to have dams to keep the water from going off, and at the other end we are asked to appropriate money to drain the swamps.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that in the one case the land is valuable for agriculture, and in the other the water is more valuable for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not suppose anybody would think that the navigability of the lakes at the head of the Oklawaha River would be of much value. I am familiar personally with that locality. There is no commerce there and will not be in the future to any great extent.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. MANN. But, on the other hand, there are great lakes there which, if drained off, would furnish a lot of fertile land on which people might cultivate crops. Here is a deliberate purpose to prevent the drainage of these lakes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we have great quantities of valuable lands in Florida, other than the lands covered by these lakes, that are not yet being utilized, so that the lands under these lakes are perhaps not yet needed for cultivation; and I do not think the people down there will want to drain the lakes at the head of the Oklawaha River, as they are now so valuable for purposes of navigation.

Mr. MANN. I have some lands down there myself that are not being cultivated. But, on the one hand, we are asked to pay money to drain some lakes, and, on the other hand, here is a provision to prevent the lakes from being drained.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will say to the gentleman that the commerce of those lakes is valued at $1,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is very little commerce on the Oklawaha River.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Tombigbee River, Ala. and Miss.: For maintenance, from the mouth to Demopolis, Ala., $10,000, and from Demopolis, Ala., to Walkers Bridge, Miss., $8,000; in all, $18,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not see the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] in the House. If he were here I think it would be due to the House that the gentleman from Mississippi should explain this proposed appropriation for the improvement of the Tombigbee River.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, of course everybody knows the importance of this appropriation in the bill, and——

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think we can pass this item without an adequate explanation of it from the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CANDLER. This provision, Mr. Chairman, adds very much to the beneficent results which will be obtained from this river and harbor bill in general. But, much as I would like to discuss this particular item, yet on account of the lateness of the hour and the importance of the bill as a whole and the necessity of getting it along as fast as possible, I think the gentleman from Illinois will agree with me that this provision explains itself.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. I think the gentleman will have to make a better explanation than that or I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. CANDLER. I feel sure my good friend from Illinois will not do that, for I assure him that no provision in this bill is more just or meritorious. If, however, a motion should be made to strike it out, then, of course, I would want to be heard at some length, and I have no doubt I can demonstrate the wisdom of the great Rivers and Harbors Committee in placing this provision in the bill. They did so after a full, satisfactory, and exhaustive hearing, in which this project was forcibly presented by Col. John P. Mayo and Mr. J. G. Weatherly, of Columbus, Miss., who were thoroughly equipped with incontrovertible facts and figures which fully justified the action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn.: For maintenance of improvement by open-channel work, $5,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I never have subscribed entirely to the rule followed by the committee with respect to recommendations made by the Department of Engineers. I refer alone to that portion of their recommendation which involves the transportation and commercial features of a river. In so doing I do not mean to cast doubt or discredit in the least on the efficiency and the splendid work of that department. However, in a number of cases, where the committee undertake to adopt an ironclad rule following implicitly the recommendations of the Department of Engineers with respect to the commercial possibilities of a river, the result is that a number of worthy streams are discriminated against. I will not say they are intentionally discriminated against, but that is the result. I allude in particular to the Cumberland River in Tennessee, a magnificent stream of nearly 500 miles of navigable river. It stood here favorably acted upon, both by the Department of Engineers and by the Congress, for more than 20 years. By some system of reasoning the Department of Engineers have said that they would only improve it at one point or section at a time, with the result that that section, comprising 200 miles running through the greatest undeveloped forest and mineral region south of Pittsburgh without railroads or other suitable transportation facilities, is left with no improvement contemplated, at least during this generation, if we are to judge by the speed with which this river has been improved during the past years. Yet the committee, under its ironclad rule, avers that it is powerless to adopt or even consider the judgment of the best business and transportation people in this great valley with respect to the time and the manner of improving this river. For many years the Department of Engineers said this river should be improved in two different sections at the same time, for the reason that the upper section, with this immense amount of forest and mineral land undeveloped, is the most satisfactory and chief feeder for the lower river. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the committee ought at times to exercise at least a revisory supervision over the recommendations of the Department of Engineers in so far as they relate purely to the transportation and commercial proposition, especially when that question is backed up by the solid judgment of the business and transportation people most familiar with the situation and most capable of judging. I hope that by next winter, when the next bill comes up, this committee will not feel called upon to follow this rule under such circumstances as will exclude this 200 miles of river with more commerce in its unimproved condition than many dozens of rivers that have had millions expended upon them in the construction of locks and dams. The lower river work on Locks B, C, and D should go on. At the same time Locks 8, 9, and 10 should be constructed. I call attention to the matter in the hope that the committee will keep this class of river and harbor legislation in mind, and will try to see if the injustice can not be remedied. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Cumberland River below Nashville, Tenn.: Continuing improvement by the construction of Locks and Dams B, C, and D, $300,000; for maintenance of improvement by open-channel work, $5,000; in all, $305,000.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, after line 18, insert as a new paragraph the following:
"Improving Obion and Forked Deer River, Tenn.: Continuing improvements and for maintenance, $540.85."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] can see his way clear to accept this amendment. The amount asked for is small, and the amount is not the important thing. The question of the abandonment of this project on these two streams is one of very considerable importance to the citizens living along those streams. They are small rivers, but they have been under improvement for from 20 to 30 years. The improvement of the Forked Deer River began in 1882. The improvement of the Obion River began in 1891.

In 1903 the two rivers were put together under one project, and since that time there has been appropriated for their improvement and for the maintenance of the work $2,250 annually.

There has been expended under the various projects that have been in operation on these streams $67,437. For the calendar year 1910 there was transported over these streams 23,911 tons, the registered tonnage of vessels being 282 tons, and the value of the commerce carried over the streams was $274,467.

Of the appropriation which was last made there remains the sum of $1,709.15 available for expenditure, and all that is proposed in this amendment is the appropriation of an additional amount sufficient to make up a total of $2,250, which has been applied to these streams annually since 1903.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] understands that I am not so much interested in the question of amount as I am interested in the matter of this project of improvement not being abandoned. I very much fear that the failure to appropriate here will be construed as an abandonment of this project of improvement or maintenance on these streams. It seems to me that the commerce of more than $274,000 carried over these rivers in the year 1910 ought to justify the committee in making this small appropriation to continue this project of improvement.

It is growing more and more important, particularly upon the Forked Deer River. About 21 miles of that river is under improvement, the town of Dyersburg being the head of navigation on the stream. Dyersburg is a growing town. Its commerce is growing. The railroad rates upon various commodities are, I believe, affected by this river improvement, particularly, I may say, upon the commodity of coal, which at certain seasons of the year can be carried into that city by barge, saving the people there from 2 to 4 cents per bushel on the coal which they buy in that town.

[The time of Mr. GARRETT having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended three minutes.]

Mr. GARRETT. I am not asking for anything new. I am not asking for anything except that the work which has been in progress from 20 to 30 years shall be continued, at a time when it is becoming more and more important. I very much hope that the committee can see its way clear to accept this amendment. I have never offered buncombe amendments on the floor. I try to approach local questions as seriously as I approach general questions. I am not asking this for the benefit of my personal fortunes, but base it upon the merits of the proposition. It does seem to me that a commerce of $274,000 plus justifies this appropriation of $500 plus to continue a project that has been in operation for 20 or 30 years, and I appeal to the gentleman from Florida to permit this amendment to be engrafted upon the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee, but under the circumstances I can not see my way clear to do so. The engineers have twice reported adversely upon the continuation of that project. In the last annual report, I believe it is, the Chief of Engineers, or the local engineer, makes the recommendation that that project be abandoned. There are $1,700 on hand already that the engineer refused to expend. Why they refused to expend it I do not know, except what I gather from the language of the report, and that is that they do not consider the improvement worthy of being carried on further.

Mr. GARRETT. The engineer reports against it on the ground that expenditures have not been made for lack of funds. I do not desire to criticize the engineer in charge of the district, and I do not know what his motives are, but his statement is incorrect; he has had the funds. The engineer there has recommended that it be discontinued, and proceeded to prove his faith by his failure to work. He has refused to carry out the mandate of this House and of the gentleman's committee at the last Congress, which carried the appropriation, notwithstanding the adverse recommendation of the engineer.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; and notwithstanding that the engineer refuses to expend it. I will suggest that the gentleman have a resolution from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors requesting the board to reexamine the matter and report thereon. If that is done, he can have a hearing and perhaps get somebody down there, some member or members of the board, to go over and examine the places where the work is desired and possibly have the opinion of the local engineer reversed if the trouble started with him. But in the face of the fact that there is an adverse recommendation and the engineers absolutely refuse to expend the money that they have on hand, something like $1,700, I think it would be folly for us to make another appropriation and add another appropriation to that already made when it could possibly serve no good purpose. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit me? I want to say that I have carried this matter before the supervising board and the board, as I am informed, made no recommendation one way or the other about it. They said they could not by any action of theirs change the recommendation; that it was a matter that your committee should deal with.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will suggest to the gentleman that when he went before the board the matter was not officially before them.

Mr. GARRETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon, the recommendation of the local engineer was before them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I mean that it was not formally placed before them for reexamination. If it is thus placed before them they will investigate the matter anew.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that here is $274,000 worth of commerce over two streams, and I am only asking in this amendment for an appropriation of $500.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman be willing to throw out the 85 cents to get any support? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. My friend from Illinois is facetious. I offer an amendment carrying just the amount which added to the unexpended balance will make the sum of $2,250, which amount has been carried for years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT) there were—ayes 18, noes 49.

So the amendmend was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving French Broad River, Tenn.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance of French Broad and Little Pigeon Rivers, $15,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 30, between lines 21 and 22, insert the following:
"Improving Clinch River, Tenn. and Va.: The sum of $2,000 authorized by the river and harbor act approved June 25, 1910, to be expended on Clinch River in the State of Virginia, is hereby made available for improving said river in the State of Tennessee as recommended on page 730 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1911."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River: Continuing improvement by the construction of locks and dams with a view to securing a navigable depth of 9 feet, $3,200,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $2,200,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, Lord Bacon never uttered a truer proposition than when he said:

There be three things which make a nation great and prosperous—a fertile soil, busy workshops, and easy conveyance for man and commodities from one place to another.

The great philosopher knew that progressive nations seek the most economical routes to the seas and the world markets along their shores, and that superior facilities for transportation develop, more than all the other agencies, the productive capacity, the wealth, and the happiness of a people.

In 1894 the Ohio Valley Improvement Association was formed for the purpose of forwarding the improvement of the Ohio River. The association worked in season and out of season, and while many others could be named for their devotion and activity, yet to former Representative in Congress John L. Vance, its president; Capt. J. F. Ellison, its secretary; and Hon. Albert Bettinger, its booster in chief, belongs especial praise for having been largely instrumental in having Congress adopt a policy with reference to waterways improvements, which took the place of the old-time pork-barrel projects.

Congress, in March, 1905, authorized the appointment by the Secretary of War of a board of engineers, whose duty it should be—

To examine the Ohio River and report at the earliest date by which a thorough examination can be made, the necessary data with reference to the canalization of the river, and the approximate location and number of locks and dams in such river, with a view both to a depth of 6 feet and 9 feet; and in said report shall include the probable cost of such improvement with each of the depths named, the probable cost of maintenance, and the present and prospective commerce of said river, upstream as well as downstream, having regard to both local and through traffic.

They shall also report whether, in their opinion, such improvement should be made, and whether other plans of improvement could be devised under which the probable demands of traffic, present and prospective, could be provided for without additional locks and dams, or with a less number than is described in surveys heretofore made, giving general details relating to all of said plans and the approximate cost of completion thereof. They shall also examine the said river from the mouth of the Green River to Cairo, with a view to determining whether an increased depth can be maintained by use of dredges.

Prior to this time there had been a survey of the river from Pittsburgh to the mouth of the Big Miami River, and the improvement to a 6-foot stage contemplated by the construction of 37 locks and dams. Some of these were approaching completion, but the Ohio Valley Improvement Association was urging a 9-foot channel, which plea the Government finally heeded in the authorization above mentioned. Under the authority of the act the Secretary of War appointed a board of engineers, which promptly entered upon the task of making the survey and furnishing the information requested. A thorough inspection was made, and much time devoted to ascertaining the extent of the commerce carried on the river.

The board made a voluminous and exhaustive report in December, 1907, and concluded with a strong recommendation for the improvement of the river to a 9-foot stage. The report deals with a number of interesting matters, which time permits me to mention but briefly. We learn that there are but 79 days in the year when boats drawing 8½ feet can leave Pittsburgh and but 97 days in the year when such boats can pass Louisville. Yet the present commerce is found to be about 13,000,000 tons annually, and that if the river were navigable all the year round to a depth of 9 feet this commerce would be enormously increased.

Attention is called to the fact that within the 30 miles next below Pittsburgh, where a 9-foot navigable depth is completed, practically every site suitable for a large manufacturing plant has been acquired. All the heavy tonnage from around Pittsburgh—steel, iron, and coal—will, on account of cheaper freight rates, resort to transportation by river and seek a market south and southwest in this country, and on the Pacific coast and the Orient when the Panama Canal is completed.

Let me digress at this point to call attention to an article published in the Outlook of July 8, 1911, entitled "What shall We Do with It?" referring to the Panama Canal. The article contains an interview with Col. Goethals, who favors the United States Government running the canal after it is completed. He says:

If we do not run the business end of the canal, it will be administered by huge private interests, which will effectually block our attempts to make the waterway a one-price institution, for the commercial possibilities are such as to tempt trust magnates quite as strongly as newly discovered gold fields draw wild-eyed prospectors. There is a fortune to be made by the concern that gets and holds the upper hand in the matter of coaling stations on the zone. I want that "concern" to be the United States. If we control the coal supply, we can offer at a reasonable, unchanging price the best grade of Pocahontas and New River coals and still make a profit. We are in the best position to run the coaling stations because, by experiments lasting over four years, we have found the grade of coal best suited for use in the Tropics—a question which has gone unsolved since steamships began to ply the waters within 20° of the Equator. In this particular grade of West Virginia coal the dampness during the rainy season causes less deterioration, and in the subsequent dry spells it has proved that spontaneous combustion is less likely to occur.

Now, does it not occur to you at once that vast quantities of coal from the West Virginia coal fields will be floated down the Ohio River and thence by the Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico on its way to Panama? But the report also points out that all the conditions favorable to a large increase in local commerce are present, and compares the results to be achieved with what has been accomplished by the improvement of the Rhine in Germany and the Volga in Russia.

While actual statistics are not obtainable for all our waterways, it is generally conceded that water transportation costs only about one-sixth as much as the average cost by rail.

The report makes the astonishing statement that—

The steamer Sprague tows to market from Louisville to New Orleans sometimes as much as 60,000 tons of freight on a single trip. The Kaiserin Augusta Victoria, one of the largest ocean ships afloat, has a freight tonnage of 25,000 tons. The horsepower of the Sprague is 2,175, while that of the Kaiserin Augusta Victoria is 17,200, and that of sufficient railroad locomotives to haul the Sprague's cargo on an average grade road 24,000.

The board finds that to secure a depth of 9 feet will require 54 dams, at a cost approximately of $64,000,000, and concludes its report with the following recommendation:

In view of the enormous interests to be benefited by continuous navigation on the Ohio River and the great development which may be expected from such increased facilities, the board is of the opinion that the Ohio River should be improved by means of locks and dams to provide a depth of 9 feet from Pittsburgh to Cairo.

President Taft, in his message to Congress in December, 1909, included a recommendation that Congress provide said sum of $64,000,000 necessary to complete said improvement a distance of 1,000 miles.

The Mississippi River has already been improved to a 9-foot stage from Cairo to New Orleans, a distance of another 1,000 miles. Of the tributaries flowing into the Ohio from the south, the Monongahela, Kanawha, Big Sandy, Kentucky, and Green Rivers have been improved to a 6-foot stage, and the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers are now being improved to the same extent. The Muskingum is improved to a point above Zanesville, and the Allegheny has been made navigable to a point 25 miles above Pittsburgh and the improvement is being extended.

Congress has determined to proceed with this great enterprise, appropriating $5,500,000 in 1911, and this bill carries $5,600,000 to prosecute the work. The Fernbank Dam is a part of this plan, and it will at all times keep a 9-foot stage of water in front of the city of Cincinnati and as far up as Coney Island. That Congress is deeply interested in this improvement is shown by the fact that the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives made a trip of inspection of the improvements of the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo in July last, devoting 10 days to the trip, and it is the present plan to complete the project in less than 10 years.

A glance at the map and a tracing of this river system at once reveals the momentous importance of these improvements. A complete transportation system by water will be set in the midst of the Ohio Valley, so magnificently devised as to serve all sections.

It will at once mean a general lowering of freight rates from Pittsburgh to Kansas City and from the Lakes to the Gulf. The people in the Ohio Valley will be the most direct beneficiaries. Cincinnati, the most central city of that valley, will be especially benefited. Indirectly the whole country will feel the effects of the new freight rates.

Uninterrupted navigation to thousands of towns and cities, to the sea, to the Panama Canal, will mean an increase of business in all lines.

Steamers and barges will make their appearance in much greater numbers than was ever known in the palmiest days of river business. The cheap transport of raw materials will stimulate manufacturing enterprises. River cities will take on new life and the Ohio Valley will become a beehive of industry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work, $200,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, line 25, after the word "dollars," by adding the following:

"Provided, That $5,000 of such sum may be used for dredging purposes at Elizabethtown Harbor, Ill."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen by this amendment that the proposition does not carry with it an appropriation of a single dollar. The appropriation which is provided for by the bill in this paragraph is for the purpose of doing work generally upon the Ohio River. I have asked that a certain portion of this amount, being a very small sum, may be diverted to specific work on the Ohio River at Elizabethtown, Ill. Opposite that town lies the foot of Hurricane Island, with the body extending up the river for a distance of 4 miles. In size it is a thousand-acre island. The main channel ran on the Illinois side until a few years ago. Two very large sand bars, in working their way down the river, chanced to come down on the Illinois side, which was then the main channel. The river being rather narrow between the said island and the Illinois shore, caused these sand bars to move very slowly and accumulated to such extent that the main channel was forced over on the Kentucky side. Just below Elizabethtown, about 1 mile, on the Illinois side, are some steep limestone ledges, about 50 feet high, and forming a part of the shore, known as Jacks Point. Between Elizabethtown and Jacks Point lies a pocket in the Ohio River on the Illinois side. These large sand bars lodged in this pocket about six or eight years ago, and are held there indefinitely by Jacks Point, the larger body of which lies down the river, leaving shoals between the point of Hurricane Island and the main body of the sand bars, which are too shallow during the low-water season to allow boats to enter the harbor at Elizabethtown. This condition prevails from three to five months during the busy season in the year.

The water in Elizabethtown Harbor and close to the Illinois shore is quite deep the year round, and boats are only prevented from entering this harbor because of the shoals lying between the foot of Hurricane Island and Jacks Point. What I seek by this amendment is to have these shoals dredged, cutting a channel through to the deep water in the harbor. I think $5,000 will be ample for this purpose. If this were done, boats could enter our harbor with ease the entire year. The river is the only means of transportation for the people at this place. Boats carry all their mail on this river, and when low water sets in our commerce lingers until the river rises, and our mails are often stopped for weeks and must be carried overland. Think of such delays, paralyzing all business for months, with no way to reach relief save at the hands of a righteous Congress. Therefore, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I beg of you that you give to this town the benefit of this small appropriation, not an additional appropriation, but simply a diversion of a part of the money which is appropriated by this paragraph, so that my people may enjoy the conveniences which are enjoyed by other towns on the Ohio River. This, and nothing more, am I requesting by this amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. In the first place, we have been trying to get away from a practice that prevailed up to within a few years ago of directing the engineers where to expend portions of a lump sum appropriated for the improvement of a river—a practice not to be recommended. Such matters should be left, in most cases, to the engineers; and this, in my judgment, is such a case. In the next place, if the gentleman has a project upon which this work can be done, the amendment is not necessary, as the engineers can and will do that work, in my judgment, if it is proper to do it. If there is no project, then it can not be reached in this way—indeed, can not be reached at all until there is a survey and a project furnished with a favorable recommendation. I have suggested to the gentleman that he have a survey, and have prepared one which I propose to introduce, or consent to its insertion in the bill at the proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, after the word "dollars," in line 25, by adding the following:

"Provided, That $3,000 of said sum shall be used for dredging the harbor at Elizabethtown, Ill."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have consulted members of the Engineering Department for the improvement of the Ohio River at my home town, and I have been told by one of them that, in his opinion, this work might be done under the provisions of this bill as it now stands without making specific directions therefor, as is provided by this amendment. But, Mr. Chairman, I was also told by him that he was not positive of the matter. Now, this sand bar, which creates these shoals, has been lying there for six long years, and during the low-water period the people of this town have been shut out from regular mail facilities, their passenger and freight transportation have been so disturbed and delayed that we never know when or what to buy or to sell, because prices have a chance to change many times before deliveries can be made, and when we leave home we never know but what we will be compelled to walk back. I therefore, Mr. Chairman, beg the committee and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that consent may be given to the passage of this amendment. I am not asking to increase the appropriation; I am not asking for an additional cent; I am not asking for anything that the committee has not already consented to except to locate the place where a very small part of the improvement shall be done.

Work which has been neglected, Mr. Chairman, for six long years, over the protests of the citizens and the Congressmen representing my district. I have repeatedly gone to the Engineering Department within the last year and requested that some work at that point be done, whereas, Mr. Chairman, my requests have been ignored and the work has never been done. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the same character of work has been done at other towns on the Ohio River without specific appropriations therefor. And I insist, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be some kind of fairness in this river-improvement work; there ought to be some kind of fairness which would give to the people who are blocked off in their commerce, who are shut out from their mails, who are held up in their avenues of communication, and cut off from the daily intelligence of the country. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be somewhere along the line some kind of fairness dealt out to these points on the Ohio River which have been ignored and neglected for years. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the committee and the honorable gentleman who is at the head of this committee will consent to this small amendment, because it is harmless to other people and other cities on the Ohio River, yet it will carry to the citizens of Elizabethtown a ray of hope on which they may hang until the dredge boat, under the authority of the Engineering Corps, as she rounds the foot of Hurricane Island, sounds her musical whistle as a signal that the great Government at Washington is ever mindful of the welfare of the American people, even my constituents on the banks of the beautiful Ohio. [Applause.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, after the word "dollars," in line 25, by adding:

"Provided, That a portion of said sum may be expended at Elizabethtown, Ill., for dredging purposes."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is practically the same amendment upon which we have voted, and therefore it is not permissible.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman desires to be heard on his point of order or the Chair desires to hear argument on the question I will be glad to be heard myself. Mr. Chairman, it is not the same amendment at all, because it leaves the whole matter to the discretion of the Engineering Corps to expend whatever sum of money, in its judgment, is necessary to give relief to the people at that town, and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, it can not be said to be the same amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Any amendment, Mr. Chairman, which varies in amount where an appropriation is carried can not be said to be the same amendment. The committee might not appropriate or consent to appropriate——

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Has not the point of order been withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the gentleman had five minutes to discuss his amendment and has three minutes remaining.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment directing that dredging be done at Elizabethtown, Ill., without naming any particular sum to be used for this purpose, because I can readily see that the committee might not be willing to vote for an amendment carrying a specific sum, yet at the same time would be willing to vote for an amendment which leaves it to the discretion of the Engineering Corps and those in authority to exercise their better judgment as to what amount is necessary to be expended. For that reason I decided to put the amendment in this shape so that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can see that I am dealing honorably in this matter. I am perfectly willing to leave the amount to be expended to the better judgment of the Engineering Corps. I am pursuaded that they in their wisdom will spend only so much money as may be necessary to give relief to my people. I therefore trust, gentlemen, that you will vote for this simple and harmless amendment. It is not an appropriation but it is only a direction as to where a part of the work shall be done. I think, gentlemen, it is a fair proposition because we have been neglected and caused to suffer many privations for six long years.

I do not regard it as an innovation upon the rules of the honorable Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

I think this amendment is in perfect harmony with their rules as I understand them, although I am a new Member. Gentlemen, I have never asked for the appropriation of one dollar of money out of the Treasury of the United States for my district. This is the first time I have asked you even to consider my district in any wise whatever. And what I am now asking for is simply to direct your attention to an emergency, so that you in your wisdom may locate the place where a portion of this work on the Ohio River may be done in order that my patient, suffering home people may be relieved, and that justice may prevail. I trust, gentlemen, that you may see your way clear to vote for this amendment and give my home people an opportunity to enjoy regular mail service and easy access to the highways of commerce and business, so that they may have the same kind of facilities as are intended to be provided for by this great Government. [Applause.] It is said that Thomas

B. Reed, on being reminded that his billionaire Congress had been criticized for extravagance for appropriating a billion dollars for current expenses, replied, "Its a billion-dollar country.". [Applause.] And so it is. Let us make all necessary appropriations for the business of a great Government, so that our enjoyment and happiness may be correspondingly large.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the collection of statistics relating to traffic, the Corps of Engineers is directed to adopt a uniform system of classification for freight, and upon rivers or inland waterways to collate ton-mileage statistics as far as practicable.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask whether, in the opinion of the Corps of Engineers, it is practicable to adopt a uniform system of classification for freight.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I must confess I have not inquired of the engineers, but this provision was copied from the provision in last year's bill, and I am informed that the engineers are going ahead with the work required by that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know whether it is practicable or not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I can not state, because I have never asked the engineers that. I do know, however, that they are going ahead with the work.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think they have made no report under this provision in the existing law.

Mr SPARKMAN. I am sure they have made no report. I understand they are going ahead with the work.

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman will notice the language at the conclusion of that paragraph is "as far as practicable."

Mr. MANN. That is, as to the collation of ton-mileage statistics as far as practicable.

I withdraw the point of order, as nobody knows anything about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore Harbor, Md., with a view to securing greater width in the channel of approach at York Spit, Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 3 on page 46.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, after line 3, add the following:
"Channel to Curtis Bay, in Patapsco River, Baltimore Harbor, and with a view of securing a channel with a depth of 34 feet, or such increased width over the completed project as may be deemed advisable."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Roanoke River, from Clarksville, Va., to the present head of steamboat navigation, below Weldon, N. C.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman, on page 47, after line 2, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, after line 2, insert:
"Eastern branch of Elizabeth River, Va., from Norfolk & Western Railway Bridge to Broad Creek."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I suggest, if there is no objection to the amendment, that it be at the end of page 46.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It ought to come in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered as applying after line 25, on page 46. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

New River, Dade County, Fla., from the head of navigation to its outlet in the Atlantic Ocean, with a view to creating a deep-water harbor for seagoing vessels.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

We are now on the item in relation to projects in the State of Florida. There were some 20 items in the fore part of the bill for Florida, providing for appropriations for projects in that State, and at this place there are a good many more items for new projects. If there ever was an illustration of the desirability and advisability of retaining a Member in Congress from a district or a State, it is well exemplified in the case of my genial friend from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.] In the course of many years he has worked his way along on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors until he has become its chairman. If he had not been retained in Congress for years, this honor would not have come to him. And, having reached the position of chairman, with great influence upon the committee and with very great knowledge of the necessities of his State, the committee very properly and very generously has provided for an appropriation for the improvement of every place in the State which has been surveyed, and then proposes to have a surveying project for every harbor, outlet, inlet, river, branch, creek, or spring in the State. The gentleman from Florida deserves it, and I have no doubt that if he returns to his place and continues in Congress he will see to it that all these rivers and creeks on which we ordered surveys will be in the end improved so that 20-foot steamers may pass through the Panama Canal up into all parts of the State of Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arroyo Colorado, Tex., up to Harlingen.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 50, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following: "Harbor at Brazos Island, Tex."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Little Kanawha River, W. Va., from Creston to the head of practicable navigation.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 51, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following: "Little Wabash River, Ill."

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 51, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following: "Ohio River, at or near Elizabethtown, Ill."

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to follow line 20, page 51, just preceding the last two amendments adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 51, to follow line 20, insert "Hughes River, W. Va."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Artificial waterway from Lake Erie at or near Toledo, Ohio, to the southerly end of Lake Michigan by way of Maumee River and the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., or other practicable route.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in relation to the last item that has been read I desired to submit some remarks, but at this hour I will ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following: "Ashtabula Harbor, Ohio, with a view to widening, straightening, and deepening the channel of the Ashtabula River."

ASHTABULA RIVER.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, since this bill has been under consideration—about two and one-half hours—commerce in the vicinity of Conneaut and Ashtabula, the two great harbors of my district, has been humming. In this brief time nearly 200 carloads of coal and ore and other products have arrived or departed from these important ports. From Ashtabula every day in the year, for 365 days, 1,500 carloads of the products of America are moved toward their destination.

The amendment asked proposes to open communication on the Ashtabula River from one part of the harbor to another. In the short stretch of river between the outer harbor and the deep water of an inner basin the river forms an elbow, through which the ships of other days could conveniently pass. But the increase in length of modern Lake vessels makes it almost impossible for them to pass the segment of the river curve thus formed at the present time.

The purpose of this survey is simply to ascertain means by which to correct this defect, and I sincerely hope it may receive the approval of the House.

I can not conclude without recalling that at the beginning of this session we Members from Ohio viewed with no little alarm the omission from the great Rivers and Harbors Committee of any representation from Ohio, with her wonderful water line on the north and south. But I am, in justice to the worthy chairman, Mr. SPARKMAN, of Florida, constrained to express my appreciation for their uniform courtesy and careful consideration for Ohio's interests.

Mr. Chairman, I renew my request that this amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Elk Rapids, Mich.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Between lines 7 and 8, page 52, insert: "Mahoning River, with a view to snagging that portion between Warren and Levittsburg, and 5 miles farther toward its source."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wolf River, Wis.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, between lines 18 and 19, insert: "Fox River, Wis., with a view to determining what repairs or extensions, if any, should be made to the levee at Portage, Wis., in the interests of navigation and to prevent injury to the Government work on Fox River, consideration being also given to the question of cooperation on the part of the State of Wisconsin and other local interests in the repair, extension, and maintenance of such levee."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Lake Superior to the Mississippi River by way of Allouez Bay, at the easterly end of the Duluth-Superior Harbor, and the Amnicon, Moose, and St. Croix Rivers, Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph until I know what this is—a canal from Lake Superior to the Mississippi River.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to give an explanation if the gentleman desires it. There has heretofore been a survey made on a different route from this from the head of Lake Superior to the headwaters of the Mississippi River by the way of the St. Croix River, but that project was adversely reported upon. This proposes to make a connection between Lake Superior and the Mississippi River by way of the St. Croix River through Allouez Bay, at the easterly end of the Duluth-Superior Harbor, and the Amnicon, Duluth, Moose, and St. Croix Rivers.

A waterway between Lake Superior and the Mississippi River is a matter that has been desired for a number of years, and it is thought and hoped by those who have investigated the project that this will be a practicable route. They desire to have a survey made. I do not think a point of order lies against it, because it involves the improvement of the streams mentioned, except a connecting link of about a mile in length.

Mr. MANN. Well, while I think I may be doing a wrong thing when I do it, I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reservoirs at headwaters of Mississippi River, with a view to the construction of locks in the dams heretofore built at Pokegama, Winnibigoshish, and Leech Lakes, in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 53, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following: "Baudette Harbor and River, Minn."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have leave to extend my remarks on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Red River of the North, from Wahpeton, N. Dak., and Breckenridge, Minn., to the international boundary line, with a view to its improvement by the construction of locks and dams or otherwise.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 53, insert the following: "The Kansas River, from the mouth to the western limits of Kansas City, Kans., with a view to removing all obstructions therefrom, dredging, and widening the mouth, and extending the improvement so as to fit the same for navigation, and to consider propositions for cooperation on the part of local authorities and interests."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River, from the mouth of the Kansas River to a point at or near the western limits of Kansas City, Kans.

Mr. TAGGART. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Kansas," in line 22, page 53, insert the following: "Consideration being also given to the question of cooperation on the part of local interests in the construction of levees, ripraps, and revetments."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not prevail. It is not altogether in the line of river and harbor improvement; that is, it does not contemplate an improvement wholly in the interest of navigation. For that reason the committee can not accept it, and I trust it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Stockton and Mormon Channels, Cal., including the diversion canal, with a view to determining what, if anything, may or should be done by the United States, either alone or in conjunction with the city of Stockton and the State of California, or with either of them, in order to increase the capacity of said diversion canal from its upper end in Mormon Channel to the mouth of Calaveras River in the San Joaquin River, so that said canal shall carry the entire flood flow of Mormon Channel and thus prevent the deposit of material in the navigable portions of Stockton and Mormon Channels.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Florida a question for information. Is there any project in this bill which has not the approval of the local engineer or the Board of Engineers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is no project in this bill that has not the approval of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GARRETT. Is there any project in this bill that is here against or despite the recommendation of the local engineer or the Board of Engineers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The local engineer is occasionally turned down by the board and sometimes by the chief; and the chief, having the power, sometimes turns down the Board of Engineers. I suppose there are some two or three items in this bill, favorably recommended by the chief, that have an adverse recommendation from the board. I think I know of two or three.

Mr. GARRETT. Are there any projects in this bill that have been recommended for discontinuance by the local engineer and the Board of Engineers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. None that I know of. If any had been called to my attention they would not have gone in.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman ought to know what the fact is about that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say no; there are none.

Mr. GARRETT. And the gentleman says, then, that there is no project in the bill that has not the approval of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. At least, the Chief of Engineers. There is none that has not his approval.

Mr. GARRETT. But there are projects in the bill that have not the approval of the local engineer and have not the approval of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know there are projects that have not the approval of the Board of Engineers, but they have the approval of the chief. We seldom find it necessary to go back to the report of the local engineer to ascertain just what it is. We are usually governed by the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GARRETT. You are usually governed by that, but not always.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We are always governed by it; yes—that is, where we adopt the project.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That hereafter the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to have made annually, through the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, so far as practicable, an investigation and examination of all water terminal and transfer facilities contiguous to any harbor, river, or other waters under improvement by the United States, and reports on the same shall be submitted to Congress in annual reports or otherwise. Such examination and report shall include, among other things, the following:

Mr. MANN. I take it that section 4 will be considered by itself. There are several paragraphs in it which are closely related.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) The general location and description of water terminals and the extent and method of their use by water carriers and their general efficiency, and whether open to use by all water carriers on equal terms, and such information as may be accessible as to the terms and conditions of use;

(b) Whether physical connection exists between such water terminals and the railroad or railroads serving the same territory or municipality, and also whether there exists between any of the water carriers operating upon waters under improvement or heretofore improved and any railroad or railroads a mutual contract for interchange of traffic by prorating as to such long-distance traffic as may be desired to be carried partly by rail and partly by water to its destination;

(c) Whether improved and adequate highways have been constructed to each water terminal;

(d) If no water terminals exist, there shall be included an opinion in general terms as to the necessity, number, and appropriate location of terminals upon such waters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the section and, without discussing it, simply suggest to the gentleman that this is a matter that probably would be better experimented with instead of putting it into the permanent law. I think, myself, it is not necessary to have this report every year. Is the gentleman willing to strike out the word "hereafter" in line 14 and then strike out the word "annually" in line 15 and insert "for the fiscal year 1913," so that it would require this report for one year? Then the committee would be far better able to tell whether it ought to be made every year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois desires to offer that as an amendment I have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is willing to accept it I will withdraw the point of order. I move to strike out, in line 14, the word "hereafter;" and in line 15 the word "annually" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the fiscal year 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 59, line 14, strike out the word "hereafter." On page 59, line 15, strike out the word "annually" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the fiscal year 1913."

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman from Illinois think the words "for the fiscal year 1913" will accomplish his purpose? The committee hoped that the report might be made at the next session.

Mr. MANN. Well, make it "during the fiscal year of 1913." I think either one would cover it.

Mr. SMALL. The report is to be made at a certain time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest that it be confined to the two years 1912 and 1913.

Mr. BURGESS. I would suggest that the language is perfectly plain; why not leave it alone?

Mr. MANN. I do not want to take the time to discuss it. This proposes to ask the same information to be furnished every year relating to the same places where there has been probably no change in the situation at all, and will only cumber up the report of the Chief of Engineers with a lot of information not necessary; and besides, much of this information will be duplicated by the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BURGESS. The next river and harbor bill will have the same provision and then we can pass upon that.

Mr. MANN. As it stands in the bill it makes it permanent law, and that is the objection I have to it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest that it be made to include the years 1912 and 1913.

Mr. MANN. That is satisfactory.

Mr. SMALL. I think that would be better.

Mr. DAVIDSON. That will give time to get all the reports in.

Mr. SMALL. Instead of "annually" say "during the years 1912 and 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 15, strike out the word "annually" and insert in lieu thereof the words "during the years 1912 and 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That there shall be printed 3,000 copies of the laws of the United States relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors passed between March 4, 1907, until and including the laws of the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, of which 600 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,400 copies for the use of the House, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department. Said compilation shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, all of Oregon's rivers and harbors have been well taken care of in the river and harbor bill which has just been read and which we are going to pass to-night. The appropriations for the district I have the honor to represent approximate $2,000,000 for the coming year. For this liberal consideration I desire, in behalf of the district, to thank the local engineers stationed in Oregon, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the House itself.

However, the report of the engineers looks with favor upon two propositions of great importance to the district that are not included in this bill. They are, first, the adoption by Congress of the project for a 30-foot channel to replace the present 25-foot channel between Portland and the ocean, and, second, the giving of authority to the Secretary of War to make advance contracts for materials to be used in building the north jetty at the mouth of the Columbia, to be paid for out of future appropriations, not to exceed $855,000.

The bill appropriates $150,000 to improve the channel between Portland and the ocean, and appropriates $1,000,000 to be expended at the mouth of the Columbia. But the engineers feel that further recognition should be given this great work by approving the project to deepen the channel to 30 feet and by authorizing the making of contracts for $855,000 worth of extra materials to be used at the mouth of the river, bringing the total appropriations for the mouth of the Columbia up to $1,855,000. I went before the House committee when it had this bill under consideration and did all within my power to have the two items here referred to included in the House bill. As the bill is now being passed without those two items, I hope that they will be included when the bill reaches the Senate. They are just items, and the commerce carried on the Columbia between Portland and the sea more than warrants the expenditure.

This bill also carries an appropriation of $600,000 for the Celilo Canal. The engineers have reported that the work could be finished more economically if this annual appropriation were increased to $1,000,000. I trust this increase will also be made in the Senate, and that the House will concur therein when the bill is returned to us. I have found it impossible to increase any of these items in the House, and I observe that no increases have been made by amendment here to-day on the request of any other Member, so I have been treated as well as the rest in this regard.

I am not complaining. I am thankful for the liberal treatment the great State I have the honor in part to represent has received. But as the total commerce handled on the Columbia River between Portland and the ocean now amounts to $75,000,000 a year, I hope to see the 30-foot channel adopted before this bill becomes a law, and I hope to see the contract authorization given for extra materials for the building of the north jetty at the mouth of the river. This would bring the total appropriation for the district up from approximately $2,000,000 to approximately $3,000,000; but her great waterways, which are national highways of commerce, justly deserve the recognition. [Applause.]

As a part of my remarks I print the three sections of the bill as they should read, to include the amendments that I hope will be agreed to in the Senate, and put in italics the language proposed to be added by way of amendment.

The paragraph beginning on line 22, page 38, should be amended to read as follows:

Improving Columbia and Lower Willamette Rivers below Portland, Oreg.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1278, Sixty-first Congress, third session, $150,000.

The paragraph beginning with line 1, page 39, should be amended to read as follows:

Improving mouth of Columbia River, Oreg. and Wash.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, including repairs and operation of dredge, $1,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $855,000.

The paragraph making the annual appropriation for the Celilo Canal should be amended by striking out the words "six hundred thousand dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one million dollars."

Of course, if these amendments, or any of them, shall be made in the Senate, the Oregon legislators in that body, and not myself, will be entitled to the credit; but I do not want the bill to leave the House without making a record of the fact that I have done all within my power, nor would I have the bill leave the House without pointing out the amendments that I think should be made.

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 40 of the bill to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida objects.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had under consideration the bill H. R. 21477, the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17837. An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes";

H. R. 9845. An act to authorize the sale of burnt timber on the public lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17242. An act to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to cross the Government right of way along and adjacent to the canal connecting the waters of Puget Sound with Lake Washington at Seattle, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 16680. An act to authorize the board of county commissioners of Baxter County and the board of county commissioners of Marion County, in the State of Arkansas, acting together for the two counties as bridge commissioners to construct a bridge across White River at or near the town of Cotter, Ark.; and

H. R. 18155. An act authorizing the town of Grand Rapids to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Itasca County, State of Minnesota.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 9845. An act to authorize the sale of burnt timber on the public lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17242. An act to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to cross the Government right of way along and adjacent to the canal connecting the waters of Puget Sound with Lake Washington at Seattle, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 17837. An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes";

H. R. 18155. An act authorizing the town of Grand Rapids to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Itasca County, State of Minnesota;

H. R. 16680. An act to authorize the board of county commissioners of Baxter County and the board of county commissioners of Marion County, in the State of Arkansas, acting together for the two counties as bridge commissioners to construct a bridge across the White River, at or near the town of Cotter, Ark.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, March 20, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to House Document No. 615, on the subject of an appropriation to pay expenses of Federal exhibits for the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography, and transmitting communications received by the Treasury Department from the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor upon that subject (H. Doc. No. 631); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing draft of a resolution, with a favorable recommendation, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept a substitute deed from grantor to the site acquired for the post-office building in the city of New York, the substitute deed to be satisfactory to the Postmaster General and Attorney General of the United States (H. Doc. No. 632); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22043) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 430); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21435) granting a pension to Bennie C. Longan, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5718) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 492) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of eliminating private holdings within the Yosemite National Park and the preservation intact of the natural timber along the roads in the scenic portions of the park, both on patented and park lands, is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to obtain for the United States the complete title to any or all of the lands held in private ownership within the boundaries of said park, by the exchange of decayed or matured timber, that can be removed from such parts of the park as will not affect the scenic beauty thereof, for lands of equal timber value held in private ownership therein, and also, in his discretion, to exchange for timber standing near the public roads on patented lands for timber of equal value on park lands in other parts of the park.

SEC. 2. That the value of patented lands within the park offered in exchange, and the value of the timber on park lands proposed to be given in exchange for such patented lands, shall be ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, direct, and all expenses incident to ascertaining such values shall be paid by the owners of said patented lands, and such owners shall, before any exchange is effective, furnish the Secretary of the Interior evidence satisfactory to him of title to the patented lands offered in exchange, and if the value of the timber on park lands exceeds the value of the patented lands deeded to the Government in the exchange such excess shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior by the owners of the patented lands before any of the timber is removed from the park, and may be used by said Secretary in the management, improvement, and protection of the park. The same course shall be pursued in relation to exchange for timber standing near public roads on patented lands for timber to be exchanged on park lands: Provided, That the lands conveyed to the Government under this act shall become a part of the Yosemite National Park.

SEC. 3. That all timber must be cut and removed from the park under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and any damage which may result to the roads or any part of the park in consequence of the cutting and removal of the timber from the reservation shall be borne by the owners of the patented lands, and bond satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior must be given for the payment of such damages, if any, as shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may also sell and permit the removal of such matured or dead or down timber as he may deem necessary or advisable for the protection or improvement of the park, and the proceeds derived therefrom shall be expended under his direction in the management, improvement, and protection of the park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 21214. An act to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 21477. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 20111, the fortifications appropriations bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Fortifications and other works of defense," subhead "Under the Engineer Department," on page 2, line 15, after the date "nineteen hundred and eight," to insert "for the completion of the repair and restoration of batteries and other structures appurtenant to the defenses of Pensacola and retaining walls to protect the batteries from floods, made in the fortification appropriation act approved May 27, 1908," and in line 23, after the word "appropriation," to strike out "acts approved May 27, 1908, and" and insert "act approved," so as to read:

For purchase and installation of searchlights for the defenses of our most important harbors, the sum of $25,000 is hereby reappropriated and made available out of the aggregate unexpended balance of the appropriations for construction of wall for the protection of Fort Moultrie, Sullivans Island, S. C., made in the fortification appropriation act approved May 27, 1908; for the completion of the repair and restoration of batteries and other structures appurtenant to the defenses of Pensacola and retaining walls to protect the batteries from floods, made in the fortification appropriation act approved May 27, 1908; for building sea walls for the protection of sites of fortifications and post buildings at Forts Pickens and McRee, Pensacola Harbor, Fla., made in the fortification appropriation act approved March 3, 1909.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 13, to insert:

For the acquirement by the Secretary of War of lands at Cape Henry, Va., necessary for seacoast defenses and as contemplated by the project of the War Department, as embodied in the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1906, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no portion of the said sum shall be expended unless it shall appear to the Secretary of War that sufficient lands, embracing an area of not less than 300 acres, for the purposes of the said defenses and their accessories can be acquired at Cape Henry for a sum not exceeding the amount herein appropriated: Provided further, That the said land may be acquired either or both by purchase or condemnation proceedings under the provisions of the act of August 18, 1890. (Supp. U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 780.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. On behalf of the committee I move that the amendment just agreed to be transposed to follow line 11, page 4, of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Has the amendment been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee had been agreed to, and the Senator from California merely proposed to transfer it to another portion of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 13, to strike out:

For tools, electrical and engine supplies, and appliances to be furnished by the Engineer Department, for the use of the troops for maintaining and operating electric light and power plants in gun and motor batteries, $45,000.

And to insert:

For tools, electrical and other supplies, and appliances to be furnished by the Engineer Department for the use of the troops for maintaining and operating searchlights and electric light and power plants at seacoast fortifications, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Fortifications in insular possessions," subhead "Engineer Department," on page 9, line 23, after the word "defense," to insert "and for maintaining channels for access to torpedo wharves," so as to make the clause read:

For preservation and repair of structures erected for torpedo defense, and for maintaining channels for access to torpedo wharves at the following localities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 3, after the word "operating," to strike out "gun and mortar batteries" and insert "searchlights and electric light and power plants at seacoast fortifications," so as to make the clause read:

For tools, electrical and other supplies, and appliances to be furnished by the Engineer Department for the use of the troops for maintaining and operating searchlights and electric light and power plants at seacoast fortifications.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senate has adopted an amendment offered on behalf of the committee. I presume, of course, it is all right, but in view of the magnitude of the amount I think it is proper that a statement should be made so that it may appear in the RECORD, otherwise it might excite inquiry which might lead to a misunderstanding. I refer to the purchase of 300 acres of land at a price of $150,000. I have no doubt the land is required, and I have no suggestion to make that the price is not a proper one——

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask the Secretary to read from the report of the committee on that subject.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from California please allow me to finish my statement? I was right in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. PERKINS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had finished.

Mr. BACON. I was proceeding to say that the presumption, of course, is that the price is a proper one, but the simple statement of the purchase of 300 acres of land for that price, without any information as to whether or not it is in a town or near a town or the character of the land, would lead to an inquiry as to how it was that 300 acres of land—simply land—in the State of Virginia should be worth $500 an acre. I repeat that in making this suggestion I do not mean at all to imply that it is not worth that much, but I think a statement ought to be made and ought to go into the RECORD, so that we may know the character of the land and the reason for the price of it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Georgia asked if this land was in a town. The proposed purchase includes, I think, part of a town, and it is also true that quite a number of houses have been erected there which will have to be removed. I think the report, if it is read in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], in charge of the bill, will give the information better than anything I could say.

Mr. BACON. If the report gives the information, I think it proper that it should be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has asked that that portion of the report beginning on page 4 be read.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, before the reading of the report is commenced, I will say to the Senator from Georgia—and I am not sure that what I am going to say is alluded to in the letter from the War Department—that the land which the Government needs and proposes to acquire is used as a summer resort. There are cottages on it, which have been built and which in the summer time are occupied by citizens of the city of Norfolk. Those houses not only have to be acquired, but the land which it is necessary to acquire is a part of a survey which is being plotted and sold for cottage purposes for the people of the cities. That explains the value of the land. Of course, if it were agricultural land or waste land or unoccupied land, $500 an acre would seem to be a high price for it; but in this instance the high price is explained by the considerations to which I have alluded.

I will say, furthermore, that the War Department has sent its representatives down to the premises and they have reported that we could not expect to get this land at any lesser price than $500 an acre; that it is increasing in value every year; and that the price will be very considerably increased if there is delay.

I will say to the Senator, furthermore, that the officer of the War Department who appeared before the committee stated—and that I am sure is not in the letter—that about 11 years ago they could have got this land for about $60 or $70 an acre. The increase in the cost of the land in that time is due to the development of this ground for the purposes of a summer resort. The War Department is satisfied, and I am satisfied, that the Government will never acquire this land for less than $500 per acre; and if it does not acquire it now it will have to pay very largely in excess of $500 an acre.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 11, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Subcommittee in Charge of Fortifications Bill,
Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: (1) Referring to your letter of March 8, 1912, requesting that the subcommittee in charge of the fortifications bill be furnished some more definite and detailed information concerning the estimate of $150,000 for the purchase of land at Cape Henry, Va., for fortification purposes, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

(2) In 1905 the President appointed a joint board of officers of the Army and Navy to recommend in regard to the completion of the harbor defenses with the most economical and advantageous expenditure of money. This board, known as the National Coast Defense Board, or more commonly as the Taft Board, with a view to bringing up to date the projects for seacoast defenses, which had last been reported upon in 1886 by the Endicott Board, so called, submitted its report in 1906, and it was transmitted by the President to Congress and was published as Senate Document No. 248, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session. In regard to the locality under discussion—that is, the entrance to the Chesapeake—the Taft Board in its report made the following remarks:

"The Endicott Board, while attaching importance to defenses at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay for the protection of Hampton Roads, Norfolk, Newport News, Washington, and Baltimore, and at the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound for the approaches to New York, confined its recommendations to so-called 'floating defenses' for outer lines. Floating defenses are defined to be 'floating batteries designed specially for operating in harbors or close to the land—armored more heavily and armed with heavier guns than any probable adversary.' Guns provided with an efficient range-finding system can now bring an effective fire on all parts of these wide channels, and render unnecessary the 'floating defenses' which have never been built and which, if they had been, would be objectionable because of vulnerability and of the great cost of construction and maintenance.

"Commercially and strategically Chesapeake Bay is to-day, as it always has been, of the very first importance. With the entrance as it now is, unfortified, a hostile fleet, should it gain control of the sea, can establish, without coming under the fire of a single gun, a base on its shores, pass in and out at pleasure, have access to large quantities of valuable supplies of all kinds, and paralyze the great trunk railway lines crossing the head of the bay."

(3) The views expressed by the Taft Board are, so far as the information in this office goes, concurred in by all military authorities, who deem the closure of the entrance of the Chesapeake to be the most important coast-defense project yet to be undertaken, and deem it of such importance that they believe it should be undertaken without further delay. The limits of this report will not permit of going further into the general subject. The inquiries in your above-mentioned letter will be taken up in detail in the order in which they occur in your letter.

(4) What is the character of this land, and how deep would it be necessary to go to get proper foundations?

The land needed for fortifications on Cape Henry is in the vicinity of the lighthouse. The beach is of sand, and in rear of the beach there is an area of sand and of sand dunes that averages about four-fifths of a mile wide in this vicinity. Back of the sand dunes is an area of low or swamp land. The land desired for fortifications extends from the beach inland to such a distance as may be necessary for the purpose, but by reason of the topography should include the seaward slope of the main sand dunes, which are approximately 2,000 feet back of the shore line. As has already been stated, the land is sandy in character; no borings have been made to determine the depth of the sand nor the character of the underlying material. From a knowledge of other similar lands on this coast it might be expected that the sand extends to a considerable depth, with possibly a layer of no great thickness of swamp soil about mean sea level. Based on the experience with the foundations of batteries at Fort Monroe, which are built on a sand spit of generally similar character, it is not expected that any great difficulty or expense would be involved in foundations for batteries.

(5) Is this land adapted to fortification uses, and is it necessary to purchase the entire 300 acres?

This land is adapted for fortification uses and is the land in this vicinity best adapted to such uses. In fact, there is no other land in the vicinity that is so well adapted to such uses; to occupy other land for fortification purposes would reduce the efficiency of the fortifications to such an extent that it ought not to be considered, due regard being had to the important military interests involved at this locality. It may not be necessary to purchase so much as 300 acres. It is necessary to secure land having a frontage on the beach of approximately 1 mile and the total acreage will depend upon the depth inland to which the purchase extends. The total cost will depend largely upon the value of the land immediately on the beach, as the land in rear, if needed for defensive purposes, can probably be secured at a relatively low price if purchased at the same time. Past experience in the purchase of land for military purposes has shown conclusively the advisability of including in the first purchase sufficient land for all purposes so far as they can be foreseen, and the purchase in this case, as in all others, should follow that principle. Authority should therefore include 300 acres, or so much thereof as may be necessary and as may be possible to purchase with the funds appropriated for the purpose.

(6) What, in your opinion, is the value of this land compared to land values in this vicinity?

The land required for fortification purposes is the most valuable in the vicinity. It is located in the vicinity of the lighthouse, and covers an area upon which there has grown up in recent years a colony or settlement of summer residents. This colony has been increasing in numbers in recent years and the value of the land has similarly been increasing. The purchase of this land has been under consideration for 10 years or more. When originally taken under consideration the land could have been purchased for a sum considerably less than what it would cost at the present time, and the longer the purchase is delayed the greater will be the cost to the United States. There is no doubt in the minds of the military authorities that the entrance to the Chesapeake must be fortified, and therefore the sooner the land necessary for this purpose is purchased the smaller the total cost will be to the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary advises the Chair that that is as much as relates to this matter.

Mr. BACON. I think that is sufficient to give the information I suggested ought to be put into the RECORD for the benefit of those who might not understand why it was that 300 acres of land were assessed at a valuation of $150,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia suggest that the whole letter be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BACON. The reading necessarily carries it there. The reason I asked that it be read was to show that while apparently a very high price was about to be paid for 300 acres of land, it was a proper price.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from California that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD is agreed to.

The report referred to (S. Rept. 475) is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, reports the same to the Senate with amendments, and presents herewith statements showing the amounts estimated for fortifications and other works of defense in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1913, the amounts provided by the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, the amounts recommended by the committee, and the amount appropriated by each of the fortification appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1877 to 1912, inclusive.

The House bill is increased, as recommended by the committee, as follows:

"For the acquirement by the Secretary of War of lands at Cape Henry, Va., necessary for seacoast defenses and as contemplated by the project of the War Department as embodied in the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1906, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no portion of the said sum shall be expended unless it shall appear to the Secretary of War that sufficient lands, embracing an area of not less than 300 acres, for the purposes of the said defenses and their accessories can be acquired at Cape Henry for a sum not exceeding the amount herein appropriated: Provided further, That the said land may be acquired either or both by purchase or by condemnation proceedings under the provisions of the act of August 18, 1890 (Supp. U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 780)."

In connection with the above provision the following correspondence is respectfully submitted:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1912.

Gen. W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would be pleased if you would furnish the subcommittee in charge of the fortifications appropriation bill, at the earliest practicable moment, some more definite and detailed information concerning the estimate of $150,000 for the purchase of land at Cape Henry, Va., for fortification purposes. What is the character of this land, and how deep would it be necessary to go to get proper foundations?

Is this land adapted to fortification uses, and is it necessary to purchase the entire 300 acres?

What, in your opinion, is the value of this land, compared to land values in this vicinity?

In your opinion, is this proposed item absolutely necessary for the proper fortification of the entrance to Hampton Roads and contributary navigable streams?

Have you worked out definite plans in relation thereto; if so, what is their ultimate cost?

Please advise me at once regarding this matter.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Subcommittee in Charge of Fortifications Bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 11, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Subcommittee in Charge of Fortifications Bill,
Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: (1) Referring to your letter of March 8, 1912, requesting that the subcommittee in charge of the fortifications bill be furnished some more definite and detailed information concerning the estimate of $150,000 for the purchase of land at Cape Henry, Va., for fortification purposes, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

(2) In 1905 the President appointed a joint board of officers of the Army and Navy to recommend in regard to the completion of the harbor defenses with the most economical and advantageous expenditure of money. This board, known as the National Coast Defense Board, or more commonly as the Taft Board, with a view to bringing up to date the projects for seacoast defenses, which had last been reported upon in 1886 by the Endicott Board, so called, submitted its report in 1906, and it was transmitted by the President to Congress and was published as Senate Document No. 248, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session. In regard to the locality under discussion—that is, the entrance to the Chesapeake—the Taft Board in its report made the following remarks:

"The Endicott Board, while attaching importance to defenses at the entrance to Chesapeake Bay for the protection of Hampton Roads, Norfolk, Newport News, Washington, and Baltimore, and at the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound for the approaches to New York, confined its recommendations to so-called "floating defenses" for outer lines. Floating defenses are defined to be 'floating batteries designed specially for operating in harbors or close to the land—armored more heavily and armed with heavier guns than any probable adversary.' Guns provided with an efficient range-finding system can now bring an effective fire on all parts of these wide channels, and render unnecessary the 'floating defenses' which have never been built and which, if they had been, would be objectionable because of vulnerability and of the great cost of construction and maintenance.

"Commercially and strategically Chesapeake Bay is to-day, as it always has been, of the very first importance. With the entrance as it now is, unfortified, a hostile fleet, should it gain control of the sea, can establish, without coming under the fire of a single gun, a base on its shores, pass in and out at pleasure, have access to large quantities of valuable supplies of all kinds, and paralyze the great trunk railway lines crossing the head of the bay."

(3) The views expressed by the Taft Board are, so far as the information in this office goes, concurred in by all military authorities, who deem the closure of the entrance of the Chesapeake to be the most important coast-defense project yet to be undertaken, and deem it of such importance that they believe it should be undertaken without further delay. The limits of this report will not permit of going further into the general subject. The inquiries in your above-mentioned letter will be taken up in detail in the order in which they occur in your letter.

(4) What is the character of this land, and how deep would it be necessary to go to get proper foundations?

The land needed for fortifications on Cape Henry is in the vicinity of the lighthouse. The beach is of sand, and in rear of the beach there is an area of sand and of sand dunes that averages about four-fifths of a mile wide in this vicinity. Back of the sand dunes is an area of low or swamp land. The land desired for fortifications extends from the beach inland to such a distance as may be necessary for the purpose, but by reason of the topography should include the seaward slope of the main sand dunes, which are approximately 2,000 feet back of the shore line. As has already been stated, the land is sandy in character; no borings have been made to determine the depth of the sand nor the character of the underlying material. From a knowledge of other similar lands on this coast it might be expected that the sand extends to a considerable depth, with possibly a layer of no great thickness of swamp soil about mean sea level. Based on the experience with the foundations of batteries at Fort Monroe, which are built on a sand spit of generally similar character, it is not expected that any great difficulty or expense would be involved in foundations for batteries.

(5) Is this land adapted to fortification uses, and is it necessary to purchase the entire 300 acres?

This land is adapted for fortification uses and is the land in this vicinity best adapted to such uses. In fact, there is no other land in the vicinity that is so well adapted to such uses; to occupy other land for fortification purposes would reduce the efficiency of the fortifications to such an extent that it ought not to be considered, due regard being had to the important military interests involved at this locality. It may not be necessary to purchase so much as 300 acres. It is necessary to secure land having a frontage on the beach of approximately 1 mile, and the total acreage will depend upon the depth inland to which the purchase extends. The total cost will depend largely upon the value of the land immediately on the beach, as the land in rear, if needed for defensive purposes, can probably be secured at a relatively low price if purchased at the same time. Past experience in the purchase of land for military purposes has shown conclusively the advisability of including in the first purchase sufficient land for all purposes so far as they can be foreseen, and the purchase in this case, as in all others, should follow that principle. Authority should therefore include 300 acres, or so much thereof as may be necessary and as may be possible to purchase with the funds appropriated for the purpose.

(6) What, in your opinion, is the value of this land compared to land values in this vicinity?

The land required for fortification purposes is the most valuable in the vicinity. It is located in the vicinity of the lighthouse and covers an area upon which there has grown up in recent years a colony or settlement of summer residents. This colony has been increasing in numbers in recent years, and the value of the land has similarly been increasing. The purchase of this land has been under consideration for 10 years or more. When originally taken under consideration the land could have been purchased for a sum considerably less than what it would cost at the present time, and the longer the purchase is delayed the greater will be the cost to the United States. There is no doubt in the minds of the military authorities that the entrance to the Chesapeake must be fortified, and therefore the sooner the land necessary for this purpose is purchased the smaller the total cost will be to the United States.

(7) In your opinion, is this proposed item absolutely necessary for the proper fortification of the entrance to Hampton Roads and contributary navigable streams?

Fortifications at Cape Henry are necessary to the closure of the entrance to Chesapeake Bay and to Hampton Roads and to all other tributary navigable waters, and the erection of batteries at Cape Henry will be the first step in that direction. As previously stated, all military authorities are agreed as to the necessity of closing the entrance to the Chesapeake.

(8) Have you worked out definite plans in relation thereto; if so, what is their ultimate cost?

The War Department has decided upon the number and caliber of guns to be placed at this time in the fortifications contemplated for Cape Henry; and preliminary estimates have been prepared as to the cost of the project so far as concerns the coast defenses proper. The estimated cost for batteries, fire-control installations, searchlights, and submarine mines is approximately $1,610,000. This sum does not include any allowance for armament or ammunition, it being the intention of the War Department to transfer armament to this defense from other points where no longer required, in which case there will be no additional cost either for armament or for ammunition other than that included in existing estimates. This estimate also does not include any part of the cost of barracks and quarters for a garrison, since it is not contemplated to permanently maintain a full garrison at this point, but only a caretaking detachment which would be increased to full strength only in case of emergencies. The above estimate is based on preliminary plans only, which plans, however, include a sufficient knowledge of the details of all the elements of the defense to permit of making a reasonably accurate estimate. Definite plans, including all details, can be prepared only after the boundaries of the tract to be acquired have been definitely determined upon and after a complete knowledge of the topography of the site thus becomes possible.

(9) From a conference with the subcommittee on the 8th instant it appears to be its desire to so limit the terms of the appropriation for the acquirement of this land that an unnecessarily large area shall not be secured or that the area necessary for these defenses shall be secured for the sum appropriated. Based on information received from the local officer, it is my opinion that the amount under discussion ($150,000) is not excessive for the purpose, having in mind the local conditions stated above. If the subcommittee desires that all the land necessary for the purpose shall be acquired for this sum or that none shall be acquired, the following wording is suggested:

"For the acquirement by the Secretary of War of lands at Cape Henry, Va., necessary for seacoast defenses as contemplated by the project of the War Department, as embodied in the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1906, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no portion of the said sum shall be expended unless it shall appear to the Secretary of War that sufficient lands for the purposes of the said defenses and their accessories can be acquired at Cape Henry for a sum not exceeding the amount herein appropriated: And provided further, That the said land may be acquired either or both by purchase or by condemnation proceedings under the provisions of the act of August 18, 1890 (Supp. U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 780)."

Very respectfully,
W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senate acts upon that motion I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether that is one of the special pension bills?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator presses his motion I should like to ask him if he would not consent that this and similar bills go over until the general pension legislation is disposed of. The unfinished business is these general bills. We are giving about half the time of the Senate to the consideration of pension matters. There are some of us who want to examine these special bills further. If the Senator can do it, we would very much prefer that he would let these special pension bills go over until the general legislation is acted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have allowed these special bills to go over for about seven weeks, principally on the request of the Senator from Georgia that he might examine each and every one of them. We have no information as to when we will finally dispose of the general pension bill, and the general pension bill, whenever it is passed, will probably not affect a great many of these cases. If it does affect them and give them as much as would be given to them under the private pension bills, the Government will have lost nothing by it. It seems to me we ought to dispose of these bills, and then we can tell, after we have passed a general pension bill, how it will affect the others and to what extent we may cease passing private pension bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 5045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension the following persons at the rate stated:

Thomas Jefferson, late of Company C, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Loyd D. Forehand, late of Company E, Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and Sixteenth Company, Second Battalion Veteran Reserve Corps, $30.

John F. Scofield, late of Company I, Seventy-third Regiment, and Company B, Twenty-ninth Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Leicester Walker, late captain Company H, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, $30.

Wingate K. Wachtel, late of Company G, Twelfth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 6 I move to strike out all of lines 5 to 8, inclusive. It is the case of Henry Shafer. The beneficiary has died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6 strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of Henry Shafer, late of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 16 I move to strike out all of lines 1 to 4, inclusive, the case of Austin B. Tobey, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 16 strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of Austin B. Tobey, late of Company H, Fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 31 I move to strike out lines 24 and 25 and lines 1 and 2 on page 32, the case of Frank Gardner, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, after line 23, strike out the following:

The name of Frank Gardner, late of Company B, One hundredth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 25, line 15, the case of William Haas, I move to strike out "thirty" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-six." Since the report was made on the bill the soldier has become almost helpless, requiring the assistance of another person, and his disabilities being due to service, it has been the usual custom of the committee to grant $36 a month in similar cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 15, before the word "dollars," strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-six," so as to read:

The name of William Haas, late of Company H, Seventy-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 29, line 24, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 24, before the word "dollars," strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty," so as to read:

The name of Ellen Fish Biddle, widow of James Biddle, late colonel Ninth Regiment, United States Cavalry, and brigadier general, United States Army, retired, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Secretary, in connection with this motion to amend, to read the memorandum in relation to the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mrs. Biddle is the widow, as before stated, of Gen. Biddle, who entered the Volunteer service May 2, 1861, with the rank of lieutenant and quartermaster. He served through the entire war, and after the war closed he served continuously until December 11, 1896, when he was placed on the retired list. Mrs. Biddle is now drawing a pension of $12 per month as the widow of a soldier of the Civil War. The Committee on Pensions recommended an increase of her pension to $30 per month. In view of the fact that Congress has frequently passed bills for the widows of officers of the same rank in the Regular Army who did not have any Civil War service, at rates as high as $50 per month, it can be argued that $50 per month in this case is not inconsistent. Mrs. Biddle is now nearly 70 years of age. She has no property, and the services of her husband should certainly accord her the same pension as has been granted in some similar cases to widows of Regular Army officers.

Ellen Fish Biddle, widow of Gen. James Biddle, was born in Baltimore, and she is the daughter of the late Capt. John McGowan, United States Revenue Marines, who commanded the Star of the West when she went to the relief of Fort Sumter. He was also largely instrumental in the establishment and organization of the present efficient Life Saving Service in this country.

Gen. Biddle fought gallantly throughout the war, as his record shows, and at times had the command of a major general. After the war he was appointed a captain in the Infantry and was stationed in the South during the reconstruction period. From Macon he was sent to Natchez, Miss., where he remained two years in charge of the Freedman's Bureau, and from there to Jackson, Miss., and after a tour of two years was ordered to Texas. Throughout his detail in the South Gen. Biddle performed his delicate duties with so much justice and feeling that he was beloved by all. The friends he made lasted until death. There are some Members of the Senate now who knew him, and many have served here in years gone by who were his warm friends.

Gen. Biddle's service in the Modoc war and other western Indian campaigns is a matter of record and one to be proud of.

His widow has nothing. She asks only $50 a month from the Government he served so well. There are many precedents for granting this increase; too many to enumerate here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it would be improper to pass this amendment without at least some statement being made thereon.

The service of Gen. Biddle was of the very best. His widow was a war widow. The death was not caused by any disability incurred in the line of service. Therefore, at the department the beneficiary in this case could receive but $12 per month. It has been the custom of the committee not to grant more than the amount which the widow would have received had the death been on account of diseases or disabilities of service origin. Had the general died in the Army she would have received $30 per month. Therefore your committee granted her that amount, that being the highest the committee grants in the case of the widow of a general or any other widow. It is for the Senate to say whether or not it desires to overrule the committee report in this respect.

As is suggested in the written statement that was read, the Senate or Congress has on a number of occasions granted $50 where the showing is certainly no more favorable than the showing in this case, but it is $20 more than the committee has ever been in the habit of reporting.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, when I agreed to offer the amendment I was laboring under the impression that the amendment would not be disagreeable to the committee. I understood that the facts in this case warranted the amount asked for in the amendment, and that there were numerous precedents for it. But in view of what the chairman of the committee has stated, that the amount provided in the bill is all that the pensioner could have drawn had her husband died of disease contracted in the service, I do not care to press for a vote on the question. In view of what the chairman of the committee has said——

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to be fair with the Senator. I have stated, however, that Congress has on numerous occasions granted $50 per month where the record did not show anywhere near the same justification as the record in this case shows.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, I do not want to ask the Senate to overrule the committee because the Senate has overruled it heretofore, unless the facts in the case warrant it; and, in view of what the chairman of the committee has stated, I will withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I propose an amendment. On page 3 I move to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10. These lines give a pension to John W. Mowrey of $24 a month. The old man is dead now, and his death will save this Government of ours from any necessity of issuing bonds on his account. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive, in the following words:

The name of John W. Mowrey, late of Company B, Second Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask for a division of the question, taking up the——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks for a division of the question. The Secretary will report the first amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not mean a division of the question so far as the amendments were concerned. I desire to ask for a division of the question so far as these separate pensioners are concerned, that we may take them up one by one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been reported to the Senate, and the first question in order is the disposition of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before that action was taken I wanted to ask, as a matter of parliamentary practice, whether a call for a division of the subject can equally be made in the Senate, or has it to be made as in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it can be made in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I have no objection to concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia now asks that the various provisions of the bill be acted upon separately.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would like a ruling of the Chair on that. While the bill, of course, is a bill consisting of several items, and I fully understand that an amendment could be offered to any one item by striking it out, there is some question in my mind whether a bill of this kind can be voted on line by line. It is not divided into sections. It is divided into paragraphs and not into sections, and you can hardly say that each one is an entirely different subject.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be glad to hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill provides pensions for separate pensioners. Each pensioner stands upon a separate case entirely distinct from the other cases. The record as to each case stands by itself. The reasons for the pension apply to each person separately. The bills were originally introduced separately. Therefore if we are really to consider them we are compelled to consider them separately.

Under the rules of the Senate it is provided that wherever any bill contains two or more subjects matter a call for a division of the question requires that each subject matter shall be disposed of separately. In this bill each pension is a distinct act by itself. As a motion could be made to strike out any one without affecting the others, so each one can be disposed of separately without affecting the others. It is a separate proposition. I simply ask under the rule that the various subjects matter of the bill be disposed of separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think—the Chair is ready to be convinced that he is wrong in that notion; he has not given this matter special consideration—the Chair is inclined to think that the question of division applies not to a whole bill, but applies to amendments which are susceptible of division. The Chair knows of no rule of the Senate which requires or can require a separate vote on each particular provision of a bill except as it is called for by amendment.

The Chair is not absolutely clear on this question. The Chair thinks perhaps the better way is to submit it to the Senate. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question, Is the point raised by the Senator from Georgia, that a separate vote may be taken on demand upon every item of the bill, well taken?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May the rule in relation to the matter be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that the Secretary first read Rule XVIII.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XVIII.

AMENDMENTS—DIVISION OF A QUESTION.

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only provision the Chair knows anything about in the rules.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not examined the precedents of the Senate. I know that under general parliamentary practice, where a resolution or a particular matter pending before a deliberative body contains two or more distinct subjects, it is a sound rule that a division of the subjects can be called for. Of course, I can raise this question in another way. I can very easily proceed by moving to strike out the items one by one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that I can raise it in that way. I would regret exceedingly for any hasty action by the Senate on this proposition that might be a precedent. There are older Senators who are familiar with the rules. I have not investigated the precedents. I thought it was just a matter of course that that was the practice. I do not undertake to discuss it in detail, because I have not investigated the precedents in the Senate upon the subject. There are Senators who, of course, must be familiar with them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have never known a case in which the Senate has agreed to the proposition that an original bill, because it contains several items or several distinct statements, could be divided and a separate vote be had upon each item. If that had been the rule, I am afraid we would never be able to get any kind of tariff legislation through the Senate. To allow a motion for a separate vote on every item would practically mean almost every line, and not only every item of itself, but where the item is divided into subdivisions we could have different votes upon each subdivision. It does seem to me it should apply at least only to the question of amendments, because everything that can be reached here by a separate vote on each one of the propositions can easily be reached by an amendment moving to strike out the item.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds in Jefferson's Manual, page 124, this reading:

SECTION XXXVI.—DIVISION OF THE QUESTION.

If a question contain more parts than one, it may be divided into two or more questions. (Mem. in Hakew., 29.) But not as the right of an individual member, but with the consent of the House. For who is to decide whether a question is complicated or not—where it is complicated—into how many propositions it may be divided? The fact is, that the only mode of separating a complicated question is by moving amendments to it; and these must be decided by the House, on a question, unless the House orders it to be divided; as, on the question, December 2, 1640, making void the election of the knights for Worcester, on a motion it was resolved to make two questions of it, to wit, one on each knight. (2 Hats., 85, 86.) So wherever there are several names in a question, they may be divided and put one by one.

That would rather indicate that the Chair's first notion, that it was proper to submit it to the body, is the proper course to pursue. The Chair will then submit it to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion. I apprehend that the precedents on this subject may be more important than the present bill might suggest, and therefore it is important to decide the question properly. My view of it may be wrong, and, of course, my sympathies are with my colleague naturally. I understand the question is on the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BACON. The engrossment and third reading is not the time that that could be put. Of course the engrossment and third reading can be separated. There is no doubt about that. I was about to make a suggestion, understanding, as I did, that the question was on the passage of the bill. Practically, it is the same thing. I do not think the question of the passage of a bill is divisible. There is no doubt about the fact of the right of any Senator to have the separate judgment of the Senate on each and every proposition contained in a bill. The only question is in what way shall that judgment be secured. I very much hesitate in coming to the conclusion that upon the passage of a bill a division can be demanded on each item in the bill. It would lead to very great complications.

I fully agree with my colleague, as everyone else will, that he is entitled to a separate vote on each one of these items. The only question is how that vote shall be reached.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair may make a suggestion, the Senate has not yet passed beyond the stage where the Senator from Georgia can get a vote by moving amendments.

Mr. BACON. I was about to make that statement, that the bill not having been engrossed and not having been read a third time, it is within the power of my colleague to get a vote upon each one of these amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By offering a motion to strike out.

Mr. BACON. But in my judgment it would not be competent, either upon the question of the engrossment and third reading of a bill or upon the passage of a bill to secure that separate vote. That is impracticable, but it is entirely practicable, and still within the power of any Senator, to secure a separate vote on each item of the bill. That is his undoubted right.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, if that part of section 36 of Jefferson's Manual which was read by the Chair is applicable, I call attention to what immediately follows it. Now, note:

The soundness of these observations will be evident from the embarrassments produced by the XVIIIth rule of the Senate, which says, "if the question in debate contains several points, any Member may have the same divided."

So that—and that is the only matter to which I desire to allude—if it has any application at all; that is, if the question is divisible, as suggested by the Senator and as seems to be the opinion of the Chair, the Senator can ask that it be divided, and the division of it need not be ordered by the Senate itself, because Rule XVIII provides:

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided.

The right is that of a Senator, which is not referable to the Senate as a whole, I submit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But if the Senator from Texas will allow, the Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that immediately following what the Senator has read comes this wording:

Except a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly. Of course the exceptions must be enforced; but where the question is a proper one—and that, I repeat, is the only matter to which I desire to address myself—it is not for the Senate to pass upon, but it is a right which can be claimed by any Senator, and ought to be enforced by the Chair when any Senator claims the right. It is not referable to the Senate as a body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair call the attention of the Senator from Texas to Rule XX? The second clause of that rule expressly provides:

2. The Presiding Officer may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate.

It is under that rule that the Chair thought it wise to submit this question to the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit this is not a question of order; this is a question of dividing the propositions contained in the bill; and the Senator from Georgia, if it is a case of divisibility, can claim that right, and it ought not to be referred to the Senate, I submit, because it is not a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is not anything that is submitted to the Chair for decision in effect a question of order? Somebody must decide, and the Chair thought that in this case it was well to submit the question to the Senate rather than to decide it himself.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling in the Forty-second Congress, first session, which I think sustains the position taken by the present occupant of the chair:

A resolution to admit two Senators elect (George Goldthwaite and Foster Blodgett) from the States of Alabama and Georgia, with instructions to the committee to make further inquiry into their rights to their seats, respectively; Mr. Thurman calls for a division of the question, so that the vote be taken separately upon each claimant. The Chair (Colfax) rules that the division of the question called for could only be allowed by an order or vote of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate, Is the request of the Senator from Georgia for a separate vote upon each——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there being so much doubt upon that subject, and not desiring to press a decision upon it at this time, I move to strike out from line 6 to line 10, on page 1, of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia gave no formal notice that he withdrew—and I wish to understand whether it is withdrawn or not—the proposition to have a separate vote on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withdraw it for the present. If I desire later to make it, I can do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 5.

Mr. BACON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Curtis	Nixon	Smith, Md.
Bourne	du Pont	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Gallinger	Owen	Sutherland
Brown	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Swanson
Burnham	Jones	Penrose	Thornton
Burton	Lea	Percy	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Perkins	Warren
Chilton	McCumber	Poindexter	Works
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Pomerene
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Rayner
Culberson	Myers	Root

Mr. FLETCHER. My colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is necessarily absent and will be for several days. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is necessarily absent. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. LEA. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is necessarily detained from the Chamber by illness.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. A division has been asked upon the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 31, noes 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The "ayes" have it, and the motion to lay the amendment on the table prevails.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No quorum has voted, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules that point of order. The roll call has just disclosed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Chair rules that the lack of a quorum voting does not affect the matter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so rules.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, on page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before I give up the floor, I desire to have furnished me by the Secretary the report of the committee and the record in this case—the testimony furnished to the committee. I desire to ask that the Secretary read the report and read also the record in the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, the Senator retaining the floor, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire to lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 it is proposed to strike out from line 19 to line 22, inclusive, as follows:

> The name of Abner F. Clement, late of Company I, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now ask that the Secretary read the report of the committee in that case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I also ask that the evidence filed with the committee be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

> S. 128. Abner F. Clement, of Francestown, N. H., was a private in Company I, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted March 1, 1865, and was honorably discharged June 2, 1865, having served three months. He is a pensioner at $12 per month under the act of June 27, 1890, granted him for total inability to earn a support by manual labor. He was formerly pensioned under the general law at $8 per month for bronchitis admitted to have been of service origin.
> The claimant is about 65 years of age. He is crippled by the loss of right arm below elbow, sustained in accident since the war. He is also afflicted with double inguinal hernia, rheumatism, and other infirmities incident to advancing years, and is no longer able to earn a support by his own manual labor. The facts in his case are substantiated by the papers filed in the Pension Bureau and with this committee. It is also in evidence that he is poor and in need of relief. His wife has a little home, but they have no other property and no means of support. An increase in soldier's pension to $24 per month is recommended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have also asked that the evidence filed with the committee upon which this report is based be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that he has read all that he has upon the subject of this item. If there be anything else, it must be with the Committee on Pensions; it is not with the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if anything else has been filed with the committee of the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. Since the Senator has asked me that question I will answer it, and I will do more than merely give an answer to his question.

When the Senator first spoke about fixing times and putting these cases over for some time, he informed me that his purpose was to examine into the record and to move to strike out from the bill those items which he really thought ought to be stricken out. He has assured me since that time that if the matter could be delayed from time to time until he could examine them there would be no filibuster, at least on his part; that he desired simply to give expression to his views.

With that understanding I have continued this matter seven weeks for the benefit of the Senator from Georgia, and I confess that I am somewhat surprised under the circumstances to see what, at least upon its face, appears to be a filibuster.

The Senator heard me state before that we received much of the records from the Pension Office. They are the original records. We receive everything there is in the Pension Office. We also receive the original records from the War Department. So in the consideration of these cases we have all the original records that appear in both of those departments. They, being original records, we have no right to hold any great length of time further than the time necessary to examine them, and they are replaced in those departments. Therefore, after holding them a reasonable time for consideration after the reports are made, they are sent back to the departments, and there is where they rest.

Of course we would have to send to the departments to again get those records. Those records will show every application that the soldier has made for a pension during all those years, with the doctors' certificates and with all the other evidence the claimant has seen fit to submit in support of his application. I know of nothing that will give us better information of the condition of the soldier than those papers which are on record in the departments. But, of course, as the Senator well understands, we can not keep them in our committee room. One person is delegated by the committee who has charge of those papers and who assists us in the examination of them, and, as I have stated, when we have reported the bill they are returned to the departments.

Later we may have somewhere in the office evidence which it might require some time to find, and if I were to look it up in each individual case it would take quite a while to get it all here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not now my purpose, and I shall not take up the time of the Senate simply as a filibusterer, but I do not think the Senate should pass seven bills with an average of about 200 names in each bill, carrying special pensions, without any consideration whatever by the Senate. We took up two or three cases in the two long bills which the Senator first presented, and we discussed them before the Senate and took a vote and then invoked a vote upon the entire bill. I contented myself with voting my convictions.

Now, there are seven of these bills on the calendar. Are they to be carried through without consideration at all by the Senate? Are we to vote 200 special pensions in a bill without any knowledge whatever on the part of the Senate as to what the facts are with reference to any proposed beneficiary?

I can not for one moment concede that picking out in this bill a few claims, which seem to be those of very short-term men, and asking for the facts about them can be termed "a filibuster." I asked that each one be taken up separately, on a division of the question, because I have not had time to run through the bill and select on which I wanted to make points. However, I have run over the bill and found this case, which illustrates the class to which I do desire to object.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the time the Senator from Georgia has had to examine the bills about 20 of these old veterans have passed into eternity, and they will receive no benefits from any pension legislation. Certainly the Senator must concede that a period of seven weeks for the consideration of bills of this kind is quite ample, and I think the Senator will agree with me that as to most of such bills no one Senator can inform himself of every item in the bills before the Senate or the House. We must rely, to some extent, upon the report made by the committee.

We have to-day passed a bill that takes a great many million dollars out of the Treasury, that will take at least five or ten or perhaps twenty times as much out of the Treasury as all the private pension bills we shall pass at this session. That bill passed the Senate to-day after about 20 minutes' deliberation, and the Senator was not so carefully interested in it as to have every item scanned, and yet it will take a great many million dollars out of the Treasury. May I ask the Senator from California how much is carried by the bill to which I refer?

Mr. PERKINS. About $4,186,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. This bill may carry a few hundred thousand dollars for additional pensions, and I submit that with the care we give to the consideration of those bills it hardly seems fair to ask for a separate vote or a division on each or a call for a quorum upon each. Every Senator knows that if the Senator from Georgia follows such tactics we can not get through with these bills during the entire summer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not going to follow those tactics to any considerable extent. I am not going to follow them to such an extent as to defeat legislation. Can the Senator give us any idea of how many of these special pension bills he expects to report at this session?

Mr. McCUMBER. We may report from 2,500 to 3,000 cases, depending upon the length of the session. I think we once reported 3,500 during a session of Congress. But it depends, of course, upon the length of the session.

I wish to say to the Senator that a great many of these bills came to us during the special session, and they were considered, to a considerable extent, by the committee during the special session last year. Therefore there were a great many more ready for this session in the beginning than ordinarily is the case, because we had all the summer, while the Senate was in session, to consider those bills. But we probably, judging from past experience, will report during the session from 3,000 to 3,500, depending upon the length of the session. The House has already passed 1,500. The Senate committee has reported about 800.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator means that there will be about 3,000 altogether passed—House bills and Senate bills?

Mr. GALLINGER. Both.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, I realize the fact that some of the persons named in these bills have passed away pending the consideration of the bills in the Senate and the other House of Congress, but it should also be remembered that during that time thousands and thousands of people all over the land who have had no pensions have passed away. They received nothing from the Government, and while it is distressing that all of us must die, it is no reason why a pension should be granted in a case where the facts do not warrant it.

Practically all of these men have been drawing pensions. The men whose names were stricken from the bill because they have passed away since the committee reported the bill were all drawing pensions. Under the general law they were drawing as much as other men in the same class. They may have had no special pension bills passed in their behalf, but I have no doubt that many more persons throughout the country have died during the past six weeks without even having had a special pension bill introduced in their behalf. So while it places in an embarrassing position anyone who objects at all to such a bill to have a fact of that kind mentioned, the statement which I have just made ought at least to be made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish the implication to go unchallenged that the death rate is the same among those reported in these bills as among the rest of the soldiers. I think, altogether, about 800 cases have been considered and reported. Perhaps there would have been 900, but nearly 100 claimants have died since we began the consideration of and reported this bill. There is no such proportion of deaths among the soldiers generally, which goes to substantiate what I have claimed, that the committee try to reach the cases of the greatest exigency, where there is distress and where there is sickness, and if we err at all we err on the side of our better emotions and from a sense of gratitude to those who were the defenders of our country. That so many of them die before we can get any bill for their benefit entirely considered that we must strike out a tenth of the claimants is evidence that they are in necessitous circumstances, as a rule, and need the relief proposed to be granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to repeat what I have said before, that I have never criticized the conduct of the committee. It is perfectly apparent from what has taken place on the floor of the Senate to-day that the committee has a hard time; that there are men who are pressing them to give more than they are giving. Were it not for the view that I have that these special pensions ought not to be granted, when I heard the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] present the claim of a citizen of that State and ask to amend the report of the committee, I would have voted with him to increase the rate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been suggested that since these bills were reported numerous deaths have occurred. What becomes of the pension when death takes place? Suppose A. B. is entitled under the bill to a pension of $24 or $30 a month and before the bill passes A. B. dies. What becomes of that item?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I can answer that question. The chairman moves to strike from the bill the name of such a person.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I mean after it has passed and becomes a law. What would happen then?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The payment would not be made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. The names of such persons are stricken out, either here or in the House, and if we should inadvertently pass a bill containing the name of a deceased person, the Pension Bureau would soon find out about the person's death, and when he died, and nothing would accrue to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the claimant subsequently died, the pension would stop.

I shall not detain the Senate longer on my motion to strike out this particular clause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out.

Mr. McCUMBER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when the name of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was called). The Senator from Oregon has been called from the Chamber on an important matter.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER], but am informed that if he were here he would vote the same way that I would vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I will withhold my vote. If I were free to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. For that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I will transfer that pair to my colleague, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon, but it is understood between us that we would probably vote the same way on these pension bills, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. As already announced, I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If my colleague were present and voting, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURTON (after having voted in the negative). I should like to ask if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BURTON. I have a general pair with that Senator today, and not being sure how he would vote on this question, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—6.

Bacon	Johnston, Ala.	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Fletcher	Martin, Va.

NAYS—39.

Borah	Curtis	Nelson	Root
Brandegee	Gallinger	Nixon	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Heyburn	Oliver	Smoot
Bristow	Jones	Owen	Sutherland
Brown	Lea	Page	Thornton
Burnham	Lippitt	Penrose	Townsend
Chilton	McCumber	Percy	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Perkins	Wetmore
Crane	Martine, N. J.	Poindexter	Works
Cullom	Myers	Pomerene

NOT VOTING—46.

Bailey	Davis	Kenyon	Shively
Bankhead	Dillingham	Kern	Simmons
Bourne	Dixon	La Follette	Smith, Md.
Bradley	du Pont	Lodge	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Foster	Lorimer	Stephenson
Burton	Gamble	Newlands	Stone
Chamberlain	Gardner	O'Gorman	Swanson
Clapp	Gore	Overman	Taylor
Clarke, Ark.	Gronna	Paynter	Tillman
Crawford	Guggenheim	Rayner	Warren
Culberson	Hitchcock	Reed
Cummins	Johnson, Me.	Richardson

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], all present, announcing that they refrained from voting because of being paired, make a quorum present. The "nays" have it, and the amendment is rejected. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the motion which I just made to strike out applied to the case of——

Mr. BACON. If my colleague will pardon me a moment, I do not desire to raise the point now with a view to a present decision and only mention it in order that it may not be construed into a consent.

I wish to say most respectfully that I utterly disagree with the Chair and, with double respect, I consider it to be beyond his authority in announcing a quorum when the calling of the roll did not disclose it; and nothing short of the voting "yea" or "nay" can constitute a quorum in the Senate upon the call of the yeas and nays.

I did not wish it to pass sub silentio and in that way possibly be cited in future as a precedent in which the Senate had acquiesced. The matter has been thrashed out heretofore, and the differences on this subject are well understood. I did not think it proper to let it pass without mentioning my dissent as to that ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The motion to strike out, which I made a few moments ago and which was voted down, was in the case of a soldier who entered the Army March 1, 1865. The war was practically over at that time. At any rate, the length of his service was so short during the actual war that I took it as an illustration of my objection to special pensions that this gentleman, who entered the service March, 1865, should be put up to $24 a month as a special pensioner while many of the soldiers who fought for four years are not in the same position.

The Senate having rejected the motion to strike out, and that being an illustrative case, I shall not make another motion to strike out on this bill and will delay the Senate no longer upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time, and passed.

SERVICE PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand that there is anyone who desires to speak upon the bill this afternoon. I therefore ask that it may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14918) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to suggest that we take up this bill as in Committee of the Whole, that it be read paragraph by paragraph, and that we have a vote paragraph by paragraph on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection, then, to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise again to a point of order, because we might as well settle the question as to whether, in the consideration of a bill—not of amendments, but in the consideration of the bill itself—we may vote upon the bill item by item where there are no amendments offered. It does seem to me that if we adopt that as a precedent it certainly will come back to plague us in the future. For instance, if a tariff bill were to be taken up from the beginning to the end, with special relation to each item, we might vote one item in, we might vote the next item out, and the next one in, and so forth, and we certainly would have a wonderful conglomeration when we got through with the bill. Then, instead of the bill passing by a single vote, we are passing a single bill by piecemeal in several votes.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we have got to have a final vote, and the final vote has to be one single vote upon the bill. But if this proposition is a correct method of dealing with all kinds of bills that are made up of more than one item, instead of passing the bill by a single vote we are passing it perhaps by a dozen or by a thousand, or, if a tariff bill, by five or ten thousand separate votes upon the final passage of the bill. That certainly seems to me to be incongruous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia, of course, can reach the same object by moving to strike out each paragraph as it is read. If the Senator is willing to adopt that mode of procedure, very well. Otherwise the Chair will submit the question to the Senate, as he intended to do heretofore. Whichever course the Senator desires is open to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Except the difference is this, Mr. President. It has been suggested to me by my colleague that the effect is just the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The effect is not the same to this extent. A motion to strike out is subject to a motion to lay on the table and can be gotten rid of very readily, while, on the other hand, if the paragraph itself were to be voted upon, that course could not be followed.

I suggest that difference in this particular instance because I desire to avoid a motion to lay on the table. I do not wish to use the procedure that I intend to take for what might in any sense be termed a filibuster. I think to take a half hour or even an hour on a bill covering 150 to 200 pensions can not in any sense be called a filibuster. I think the Senator must certainly agree that that is true.

I do not know that I will insist, Mr. President, upon your submitting that question to the Senate. When the first paragraph has been read I will move to strike it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish simply to answer the Senator from Georgia. I certainly do not wish to accuse him of such a purpose when he has disclaimed it. But, knowing the Senator, I felt when he picked out the very first name and so far forgets himself and those names which to him are household words as to move to strike out from any bill the name of Thomas Jefferson, he must really be intending to filibuster and must not have the question sincerely at heart.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I regret very much that I made the motion. The truth is I overlooked the fact, or else I would have passed him on his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. BACON. If the Chair will pardon me a moment, I do not understand the Chair to have ruled that the bill can not be considered by items.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair did not rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I do not press my motion on that subject, because I am not prepared by an examination of the precedents to submit anything to the Chair in support of my motion, and I do not wish to be the cause of a ruling when

I am not able to contribute my proper part toward sustaining the side that I think is sound.

The Secretary read the first paragraph of the bill, as follows:

The name of William Russell, late of Capt. Samuel Gordon's Company H, Second Regiment Oregon Volunteers, also of Capt. Edward Sheffield's Company A, of said regiment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to strike out that paragraph, and I ask, before the motion is put, that the report of the committee upon it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

H. R. 1919. William Russell, of Roseburg, Oreg., served as a private in Capt. Samuel Gordon's Company H, Second Regiment Oregon Volunteers, from November 25, 1855, to February 16, 1856, and in Capt. Edward Sheffield's Company A, of the same regiment, from February 18 to May 10, 1856, and is receiving a pension of $8 per month, the rate allowed by the general law to survivors of the earlier Indian wars.

In a sworn statement filed with the bill the petitioner states that he is 76 years of age; that he owns no real estate or personal property, and that his sole income is his pension of $96 a year.

The original pension in this case was allowed by special act approved February 9, 1899, before the general-law act was passed, June 27, 1902, granting pensions to the survivors of the Oregon and Washington Territory Indian wars; hence, the rule against the increase of a pension allowed by special act has only a technical application to this case. The pensioner now has title under the general law to a pension of $8, and could obtain it upon application by surrendering his present special-act pension of the same amount.

Following precedents in similar instances, your committee respectfully recommend a rating of $16 per month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if I understood him correctly in saying that this is a House bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it reported by the Senate committee just as it came from the House, or has the committee also scrutinized it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there have been no changes from the report of the bill in the House, and, as I notice it, there is no grant of a pension higher than $16 per month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that amendments have been recommended by the committee, but not changing the amount.

Mr. McCUMBER. They were amendments made by the House committee, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate committee amendments have been reported.

Mr. McCUMBER. Amendments simply correcting clerical errors, but no amendments as to amount.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are amendments as to the service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is really a $16 pension bill running straight through, is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I think not in every case. I think the highest is $16 in any one case. There may be one higher than that, but as I remember it the highest rate is $16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, to strike out the paragraph which has been read.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee to the paragraph will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Pensions report was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "regiment," to insert "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war," so as to make the paragraph read:

The name of William Russell, late of Capt. Samuel Gordon's Company H, Second Regiment Oregon Volunteers, also of Capt. Edward Sheffield's Company A, of said regiment, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph of the bill was read, as follows:

The name of Andrew J. Haydon, late of Capt. John Kelsey's Company B, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteer Infantry, Indian wars, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to strike out that paragraph. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the committee, a question. What change does this make from the regular pension?

Mr. McCUMBER. The change is from $8 per month. The regular pension allowed for service in the Indian wars is $8 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which he is receiving.

Mr. McCUMBER. Which he is receiving. Therefore there is an addition of $8 per month when we grant a pension of $16 per month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, Mr. President. Will the chairman permit me to ask him just one or two more questions for information? Do we extend the basis of the classification of the Civil War pensions to the basis of the classification of these men when we allow an increase beyond what the law generally gives them?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would be the same classification that we would grant in other cases, where the soldier has become very old and feeble and requires more or less aid or attendance, and is in destitute circumstances. We have never in any case recognized the soldiers of any other war as being entitled to the same consideration as the soldiers of the Civil War and we have not granted as high rates, even in cases of destitution in the Indian wars, which are generally of rather short duration and not so severe as was the Civil War, as we have granted to Civil War veterans. Therefore, the service generally being short and these particular Indian war veterans having been placed upon the pension roll by a vote of Congress not a great many years ago, we have not regarded them in the same light as the veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Could they not properly be left where they are, then, I should like to ask the chairman, and let what extra money we have go to the veterans of the Civil War?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, they are but a bagatelle in number. The amount is very small. The Pension Committees of both Houses have been in the habit of not only considering veterans of the Civil War, but veterans of the Spanish War, the Regular Establishment, the Indian wars, and the War with Mexico. It might be said we could leave all of them where they are, but we have granted them pensions. We might have left them where they were without granting them an original pension. The same justification for granting them, the original pension of $8 per month could be urged with added reasons when many years thereafter they are old and destitute and unable to earn a living.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will not press my motion to strike out the particular name that I mentioned, because that name seems to classify with the balance of them, but I will state my objection to all these pensions.

They are not men who have served any considerable length of time in the Army. They are men of short service. They may be in need, but there are thousands of men and women all over the United States in need. They receive a small pension. To that I make no objection. I simply think that they fall into the same kind of class as the very short-term pensioners to whose increase of pension I was objecting, with reference to the other bill. Being short-service men, and not men who can be classed with the men who served two, three, and four years during the Civil War, I think they ought to be treated like I urged a few days ago the 90-day men ought to be treated; they ought to be left with the amount that the statute gives them.

As my objection reaches to all of them, and as I only wanted to take time enough to bring out just what were the facts and to state my objection, with these objections to the entire bill, I will not make my motion with regard to any special item, and will leave the matter to be voted upon on its merits.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia withdraw his present motion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withdraw my motion to strike out the particular item.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think it is only proper to say, briefly, the service of this class of men was the quickest, sharpest, and most desperate that a soldier can know. It is the call for help at midnight when the Indians are burning the homes of frontiersmen; when the hand of the settlement is being stayed; when helpless people who have no government close at hand, no troops to whom they can appeal, must band together and fight their own battles. They are just as much citizens and just as much entitled to citizenship and its protection as those who live in more dense settlements.

Those who have lived on the frontier know that there is no service that calls for such quick response of patriotism as that which defends the homes and settlements of the frontier settler. Even though the term of service seems short, I think it is safe to say that half the men who enter it are killed or wounded for life. Those who live on the frontier know that they have in every community men crippled, and when you inquire, "How did you get your wounds," they say, "In the fight at Standing Rock," or "In the fight at Willow Creek," or "In the fight at Camas Prairie," or "When Joseph's Band broke loose"; and those are the responses that tell the history.

I was riding with one of Idaho's best men not very long ago, one who has an arm that has a piece of bone about 4 inches long out of it entirely. I asked, "Where did you get your wound?" He said, "We will pass there after a bit," and he showed me the place where he got it. It is a quiet tragedy; there is nothing heroic about it; it is not exploited in the newspapers. The men do not wear uniforms and they do not have drums and music. They have none of the panoply of war about them. They have no home-comings where they are met by a community. They stagger back home to carry the wounds they received in this service, of which the great world knows nothing. They stagger back home to carry those wounds through their lives. I could stand here and name more of them of my own knowledge than there are Members of this body, with whom I have associated for 30 years or more. This is a meager pension for that class of citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment of the Committee on Pensions.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 20, after the word "Volunteers," to insert "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Elzey Bird, late of Company E (Capts. Williams and O'Neill), Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, after the word "Volunteers," to insert "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Daniel L. Anderson, late of Capt. Sheffield's Company A, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 13, after the word "Infantry," to insert "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Patrick Moloney, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 19, after the word "Infantry," to insert "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Larkin Richardson, late of Capt. Hembrie's company, First Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteer Infantry, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 24, after the word "Volunteers," to insert "War with Spain"; on page 4, line 1, after the word "additional," to strike out "for" and insert "on account of the"; and in line 2, after the name "Vanderbeek," to insert "until he reaches the age of 16 years," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Sophronia Vanderbeek, widow of Calvin V. Vanderbeek, late of Eleventh Company, Signal Corps, United States Volunteers, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month and $2 per month additional on account of the minor child of the said Calvin V. Vanderbeek until he reaches the age of 16 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 17671.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17671) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendments proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, Mr. President. This seems to be a Spanish-American War special pension bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it covers also the Regular Establishment. I am not certain about that, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this is a line of pensions entirely different from the special pensions which have been granted, and I do hope the Senator from North Dakota, who is the chairman of the committee, will not press it upon us. These are special pensions for soldiers of the Spanish-American War. I see some Georgians in the list, and I am free from any embarrassment in objecting to the bill. This is certainly not in the line of pensions that I had under consideration with the Senator when we were discussing the matter some time ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are only seven cases in this bill. The Senator from Georgia probably understands that there being two pension committees in the other House, one called the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the other the Committee on Pensions, one of the committees having jurisdiction over pensions relating to the Civil War and the other over all other pensions, necessitates our dividing our omnibus pension bills into two classes, so that when they reach the other House they may go to the proper committee, and no names be placed upon the bill that could not be properly referred.

This bill is practically composed of the names of those as to whom appeal has been taken from the Department of the Interior to the Committee on Pensions of the House and the Pensions Committee of the Senate—the two committees. If the Senator will examine the cases, I think he will find that all of the applicants are granted only such pension as would have been allowed in the bureau had the bureau found that the injuries were of service origin. The committee as to all of these cases has found that the injuries suffered were injuries of service origin. They are all, therefore, original pensions, and the amounts granted are the same as would have been granted by the department if the evidence before the department had convinced the department that the injuries were of service origin. I am inclined to think that very often the officials of the Bureau of Pensions are overtechnical and overcareful lest some improper cases get upon the pension roll; and having a great number of cases before them, it is incumbent upon them to perform their duties with the utmost care. I am not surprised, therefore, that securing additional evidence in each one of these cases, we may have come to a conclusion different from that which was arrived at by the Bureau of Pensions, and having come to that conclusion, we have reported in favor of granting pensions in the amounts that are allowable under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask has not the Pension Board of Appeals been abolished in the department?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not certain as to that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be far better to reestablish a Pension Board of Appeals in the department, where half a dozen good men might calmly hear these cases on review, than to undertake to bring them here?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Board of Pension Appeals has only been reduced in numbers. That is my recollection. They are still considering cases on appeal, but the number of the board has been reduced about one-half.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is still that opportunity for a pensioner to appeal?

Mr. CURTIS. There is; certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. And undoubtedly appeals have been taken in these cases; but I would invite the Senator to carefully read the reports in each case. Then, though he may not have all of the evidence, the report being in conformity with the evidence, I think the Senator will agree that in each of these cases the ailments complained of are of service origin, and therefore the claimants are entitled to the pension allowed by law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But still, Mr. President, for a committee of the Senate and of the other House to be called upon to perform this semijudicial work, to pass as judges in final appeal from the action of the Board of Appeals in the Pension Office, is a very unsatisfactory practice.

I, of course, do not know what are the facts in these particular cases, but I understand we are asked to vote these special pensions to soldiers of the Spanish-American War upon the ground that their injuries were of service origin, when the Department of the Interior found that they were not of service origin. Is that the case?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is hardly correct. I will say that the Department of the Interior did not find that they were not of service origin, but the Department of the Interior held there was not sufficient evidence before that department to establish the fact that they were of service origin. I think that puts it nearer correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They found that the applicant could not prove that his injuries were of service origin?

Mr. McCUMBER. The applicant evidently failed to prove that to the satisfaction of the bureau, but the applicant did not fail to establish his case before the committees of both the Senate and the House, and I believe that the members of the two committees are really as competent to judge on the question of evidence and the fair conclusion to be derived from that evidence as the clerks of the Bureau of Pensions. I believe that the Senator from Georgia would be just as competent, after reading the evidence in one of these cases, to determine whether or not the disease or ailment complained of originated in the service as would any single clerk in the Bureau of Pensions; and that which I would grant to the Senator I would grant to other members of both committees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator for the very high compliment he has paid me. I really believe, with due modesty, I could pass on that, and I have no doubt the committee is entirely competent to pass upon it, except that I know the committee can not give the requisite time to these cases—that it is utterly impossible for a committee to undertake to investigate and pass upon 9,000 cases in two years. For that reason, however able the members of the committee might be, I had rather risk capable men selected and put in the department than nominally to have the committee pass on these cases, for it is simply nominally. The committee simply can not do it; they can not investigate them. That is one of the reasons why I am opposing these special pensions. The investigation must be done by a clerk of the committee, or it must be done by somebody on the outside.

I do not think we ought to undertake the practice of granting special pensions to soldiers of the Spanish-American War. We are now asked to put on the pension rolls men who undertook to establish before these committees that their injuries were of service origin in the Spanish-American War, who could not prove it before the department, who were turned down by the department, turned down because they could not show that their disabilities were of service origin, and now have come to Congress and ask that they be given special pensions. I do not think we should consent to it.

There are a large number of the Spanish-American War soldiers. Let us stop with the veterans of the Civil War, and let us leave the men in the Spanish-American War to a uniform treatment, and to have their cases passed on by the Pension Bureau. It is unnecessary for me to undertake to single out individuals. I could detain the Senate to investigate them, but I never intended to do that. I do not think we ought to undertake legislatively to determine that certain men in the Spanish-American War received their injuries as of service origin when the Pension Bureau and the Interior Department reject their claims upon the ground that the injuries were not of service origin.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have been endeavoring to understand the position of the Senator from Georgia as to pension legislation. He objects to this bill because it grants relief to soldiers of the Spanish War, and a moment ago he objected to relief measures for soldiers of the Indian wars. Then he filed several motions to strike from the list the names of soldiers who enlisted during the last days of the Civil War—the men who were in at the finish—and I also understand that he is opposed to House bill No. 1, which does take care of all the veterans of the Civil War. Now, I am at a loss to understand what kind of a soldier the Senator favors pensioning. It seems to me these classes cover about all the classes of soldiers we have.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not, Mr. President, feel called upon to certainly make the Senator understand me, but I will try to do so.

The line of thought I have been urging has been that there is a limit of the amount which should be charged against the Treasury for pensions; that $150,000,000 a year was a fair proportion for pensions as compared with the other responsibilities of Government, and that the proper distribution of that money would be to give the large part of it to soldiers of the Civil War who had served long enough to carry the real burden of the struggle—to give the $150,000,000 in very large part yearly to the men who went in for three and four years, and to the men who were in two years, and very little of it to the 90-day men unless they received injuries in the line of service.

Of course, no matter how short the service, if a man received an injury in line of duty, the length of time ought not to affect his pension. If he received an injury, even though he only served a week, his pension should be just like the pension given to anyone else.

What I have been undertaking to present to the Senate has been the theory that we can not go to an unlimited extent for pensions; that $150,000,000 a year is a liberal sum; and that what we ought to do is to distribute that sum in such a way as to give it to the men who deserve it most; and that those men deserve it most who had the long-time service. In referring to the Spanish-American War soldiers, I regard them as very short-time-service men, and I was inquiring about service in the Indian wars upon the idea that that was also a short-time service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has criticized not the committee, I think, but the system which the committee has adopted of sometimes overruling the Bureau of Pensions upon a question of whether or not a given disability was of service origin. The Senator thinks, if I understand him correctly——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will yield to me, I did not mean——

Mr. McCUMBER. That those in the department may far better pass upon a question of that kind than the committee or its clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not better than the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I understand the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The line of thought I desired to present, if the Senator will permit me, was not that the committee itself can not take any one case or a dozen cases or a hundred cases and give their time to them——

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave the Senator the benefit of the explanation, that I did not understand that he criticized the committee, but I want now——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But that the committee could not have time to do it themselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I want to meet the Senator's prime objection against our reconsidering those matters. One of the very first cases in this bill to which the Senator objects is a case of this kind: The soldier was injured in the War with Spain; he was made blind; he brooded over his blindness until he became insane; and in a period of insanity, after he had come home, of course, he walked down to the river and there, with suicidal intent or by accident, he was drowned. The department held that the widow had failed to show that her husband's death was due to disability incurred in the service. It appeared to the committee, however, the fact having been established that he was blinded in the service, it having been established that his mental condition was brought about by that blindness, and that he was drowned either during the time when he was insane or because of accident due to blindness, that in fact his death was the result of injuries incurred in the service, and I leave it to the Senator from Georgia whether we were not justified in a case of that kind in overruling the findings of the department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say that the statement of the Senator appeals to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. Here is another case I will present to the Senator: During the time the soldiers were quartered in the Philippines—I think they were in the Philippines at that time, but it was at any rate during the Philippine War—one soldier asked his comrade to loan him some money. Feeling that the request for the money was made by one who would not be likely to pay it back, he declined to make the loan. That evening when he was preparing to retire the soldier who had been refused the loan slipped up behind him in his tent, and with a dirk stabbed him, and from the wounds received he died. The department seems to have held that the death was not incurred in line of duty—that is the way the law reads "in line of duty"—but the committee concluded that there was no duty incumbent upon him to loan his comrade any money; that his duty was to go to his tent at some time and go to bed, and therefore he was performing his duty when he was doing that, and being murdered because of his refusal to loan a sum of money to a comrade he had been killed in line of duty. The committee, overruling the department, has reported in favor of granting the widow such pension as she would have received had the department held her husband had been killed in line of duty.

It is in cases of that character that the committee has seen fit to overrule the findings of the Department of the Interior. I will say to the Senator that we view with extreme care any application for original pension by special act of Congress in a case which has been turned down by the bureau, because our rules require that the claimant must first exhaust his rights in the department. I think the Senator will agree with me that in the last case to which I have referred the death of the soldier was in line of duty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What argument did the department present? Does the Senator recall whether that case went into the published pension decisions?

Mr. McCUMBER. They did not present any argument; they simply refused to grant the pension.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did the case go to the Pension Board of Appeals on appeal?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not certain. I am simply certain that that was the holding of the department. The case then came here, and we held that the injury was received in line of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask at this time, if there be no objection, without waiting until we come to the particular cases, that I be allowed to move amendments striking out certain paragraphs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 14, I move to strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, inclusive, the case of William M. Clark, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, after line 18, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of William M. Clark, late of Company C, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 13, I move to strike out lines 18 to 21, inclusive, the case of William Starry, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, after line 17, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of William Starry, late of Company B, Ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 22 I move to strike out lines 24 and 25, and lines 1 and 2, on page 23, being the case of William A. Willis, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after line 24, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of William A. Willis, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read; and as I want a little time to look at the items as the reading proceeds, I would rather the Secretary should read the whole bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

Mary J. Stumpff, widow of William G. Stumpff, late of Company F, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, $20.

Robert M. Reynolds, late of Company C, First Regiment Indiana Volunteer Heavy Artillery, $24.

Ansil Decatur, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Hiram Smith, late of Company A, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Joseph C. Norris, late of Company E, Seventy-first Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $20.

David H. Burge, late of Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

James H. Baker, late of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

David T. Moneypenny, late of Company K, Fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, $40.

William R. Jones, late of Company G, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Francis Bills, late of Company G, Fifty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Emma Montgomery, widow of Harry Montgomery, late of band, Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, $20.

Marcy A. Tyler, widow of Edgar L. Tyler, late of Company H, Twenty-third Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and Company I, Fifth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, $20.

James Scott, late of Company A, First Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Nathan Wakefield, late of Company H, Thirteenth Regiment, and Company I, Sixth Regiment, New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, $24.

William H. Amsbury, late of Company A, First Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and Company A, Sixtieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to amend on page 20 by striking out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20 strike out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, as follows:

The name of Enoch Adkins, late of Company H, Fiftieth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the report of the committee with reference to this case be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

S. 4225. Enoch Adkins was a private in Company H, Fiftieth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. He served from March 11, 1865, to July 28, 1865, and was honorably discharged. He is in receipt of a pension under the service act of February 6, 1907, at the rate of $15 per month. He was formerly pensioned at $12 per month under the act of June 27, 1890, granted him on account of total inability to earn a support by manual labor.

Claimant is an old man of 74 years of age. The report of his last medical examination, taken February 10, 1908, showed that he was disabled by heart disease, chronic bronchial asthma, disease of prostate gland, and general and senile disability, and was wholly unable to perform manual labor. Medical evidence filed with this committee is to the effect that claimant is at present totally disabled for the performance of manual labor, by reason of disease of lungs and kidneys, rheumatism, and enlarged prostate gland, and other infirmities of age. It is also shown that he is destitute of property and has no means of support other than his pension. An increase in soldier's pension to $24 per month is recommended on the ground of his present condition; it is not due to his service, which was comparatively short, and no greater increase is warranted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this soldier entered the service March 11, 1865. While, of course, I understand that legally the war was not over on the 9th of April, 1865, and while, of course, I am familiar with that fact that Mr. Davis did issue a proclamation, read by the Senator from Michigan, in which he expressed the opinion that the war was not over until after that date, everybody but Mr. Davis knew the war was over. Those of us who were even old enough to walk around—under 10 years of age—knew it was over. So, in point of fact, so far as the soldier is concerned, he did not get into the war, and he could not have. March 11, 1865—just a few days before the war closed. Of course, I understand about the proclamation and the legal termination of the war, but so far as the actual fighting is concerned, it was over.

Now, I urge that the view of Mr. GARDNER, as expressed before the committee, that these short-term men ought to be satisfied with $12 a month, is the sound view, and that there is no more reason why they should be put beyond $12 a month than anybody else who is in trouble. I therefore move to strike out from the bill this claim, on account of the very short service of the claimant.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the claimant in this case had four or five months' service before he was discharged. We are granting like pensions to soldiers who served 90 days and who were discharged. We are granting like pensions where soldiers were not engaged in actual battle at all. The laws of the country relative to pensions do not require that the soldiers shall have been engaged in actual battle in order that they may derive the benefits of the pension laws.

This man enlisted before the war closed, even under the theory of the Senator from Georgia that it closed on April 9; and no one could foresee that Lee was going to surrender on April 9. Probably if this soldier had known of that fact beforehand he would not have enlisted. But he answered the call of his country while the war was going on, and he is now drawing a pension because he served 90 days and more, according to the holding of the department. In other words, the war was not closed; hostilities had not ceased until three months after he enlisted.

We are not granting the sum that we would have granted to one of longer service. We are granting but $24 per month simply because of the short service. The condition of this old veteran is such that probably the committee would have allowed him from $36 to $40 per month had he served a year or more. But having had only this short service, under the rule we have followed in attempting to treat all alike where conditions are similar, we have granted in this case only $24.

In view of the condition of this old veteran, his many troubles, and the suffering he has endured, I believe the committee has done its duty in allowing him the meager sum of $24 per month, which is $9 more than he is receiving under the general law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if I am correct in the thought that the service pension of the Mexican War soldiers is based on 60 days' service?

Mr. McCUMBER. Sixty days; and in the Revolutionary War the service pension, finally, was for 14 days' service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and a great many of the soldiers of the Mexican War, as I remember, exhausted their time en route. They did not get to Mexico, and yet a great many of them were pensioned because they were in the service for that length of time, ready to fight if they had an opportunity.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; we have treated them much more generously than we have the soldiers of the Civil War. I presume it was because in the earlier period, when we adopted the 90 days' basis, the country felt it was so poor that it could not grant a pens[illegible] to anyone who had served less than 90 days in the service. At the same time we have been granting pensions to those who served only 60 days in the War with Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not know whether this soldier was in any actual battle or not, but there was opportunity for it. I have a very feeling recollection of that. I myself was wounded considerably after the 11th of March, 1865. So if this soldier was with the Virginia army he had an opportunity to be shot by the rebels, as they are called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 21, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, Father of all souls, ever ready to help those who seek Thee, increase our faith, hope, and love—blessings which leap like angels from the temples of our hearts and bring us on our way rejoicing.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Find us farther than to-day.

So by these angels increase our usefulness to Thee by a faithful service to our fellow men, that at the end of the King's Highway we may merit the "well done, good and faithful servant," for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and there is no business in order to-day except business set for Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But this is a privileged resolution. It comes from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule nothing is in order on Calendar Wednesday except the business set for Calendar Wednesday, unless by a two-thirds vote the business in order on Calendar Wednesday is set aside.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If the House grants unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which is privileged itself, may not such resolution be taken up under such unanimous consent, notwithstanding the rule to which the Speaker has referred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will quote from the rule:

7. On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule, unless the House by a two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith shall otherwise determine. On such a motion there may be debate not to exceed five minutes for and against.

On a call of committees under this rule bills may be called up from either the House or the Union Calendar, excepting bills which are privileged under the rules; but bills called up from the Union Calendar shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the Chair whether unanimous consent was not really equivalent to a two-thirds vote under the rule.

The SPEAKER. No. It takes a motion and a two-thirds vote to set aside business in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request and will renew it to-morrow.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill S. 3367, to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to homesteads. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DICKINSON, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3367, with Mr. DICKINSON in the chair.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the minority leader whether he now desires to fix any definite time for general debate on the bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think so.

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make a general introductory statement as to the objects and necessity for this legislation. This bill is what is known as the three-year-homestead bill. It affects primarily only the western part of the United States. It is a modification of the present homestead law, which has been in force in this country for about 50 years. During recent years conditions have so changed in the West that there are a great many reasons why the homestead law should be amended. I will only mention a few of them.

In the first place, when the law was originally enacted we had in all the Western States large stretches of fine public lands, comparatively no trouble or expense to reclaim, and easy to cultivate, and lands that did not require irrigation. It was mostly in the humid region of the United States, where the homesteader could break the sod, plant the seed, and get a big crop the first year. To-day practically all of that good land has gone into private ownership, making 8 or 10 splendid States, and the now remaining portions of the public domain in the United States are largely isolated tracts and in the arid region. There are to-day, comparatively speaking, no large bodies of good land left in this country open to settlement. There are now left only small sections and usually, as I say, isolated, irregular tracts of land that are open to entry. The remnants of the public lands to-day that are not withdrawn from entry are lands that are largely covered with brush or some kind of forest growth, usually sagebrush or oak brush or greasewood, or shrubbery of some kind, and often very rocky, and are exceedingly difficult to clear, break, and cultivate. In addition to that, these lands must be irrigated, which nowadays involves an enormous expense. So that the conditions in the West to-day, gentlemen, have so changed that it is now almost impossible for a poor man to go upon the public domain and locate a homestead and comply with the law. It has almost become a rich man's proposition. A man has either got to have from $3,000 to $5,000 in cash or he has got to be given an opportuntiy during the homestead period to make a living for himself and family and also earn money with which to reclaim the land or he can not do so. There are other conditions that have affected the change in the situation in the last few years. We used to have what was known as the preemption law. By that law a man was allowed to live upon his 160-acre claim for six months, make reasonable improvements, and obtain title to it without any bother. But that law has been repealed. In addition to the repeal of the preemption law, the rulings of the Department of the Interior have practically repealed the law allowing commutation of homestead entries. That law itself was a very great benefit to the settlement of the West. It allowed a man to live on his homestead for 14 months and then come in and pay a dollar and a quarter an acre and get his patent. On account of the adverse rulings of the Interior Department that law is now virtually a dead letter. Under the regulations the desert-land law has become a very expensive law to comply with. So there is left on the statute books now practically only the five-year homestead law that is available for the ordinary poor man. I may say we are not in this bill asking to amend the desert-land law. I have individually passed two bills this session amending the desert-land law, and one amending the homestead law as to settlers under reclamation projects, and one amending the isolated tract law; but this bill affects only the homestead laws requiring residence upon the land.

The rulings of the Department of the Interior and the procedure and construction of the public-land laws by the Federal officials have been getting more and more strict and technical all the time until now they are very seriously retarding the settlement of the West, and have practically suspended not only the operation of the commutation law, but the stone-and-timber law and the coal-land law, and are seriously interfering with our irrigation development. People are not only deterred from making original entries, but when a man who has made an entry finally comes to make final proof his patent is held up for various kinds of examinations by various kinds of Government agents. One set of agents go out and investigate to learn if a man has lived on the land all the time and fully complied with the law as to residence and improvements. Then, after a while, another Government agent goes out and investigates to see if there are any water-power sites on the land; and then, within a year or so, the United States Geological Survey sends out a special agent to see if there is any mineral, or coal, or oil, or gas, or phosphates on the land; and the homesteader's final proof is held up indefinitely until all these reports are sent to Washington and acted upon. So that at the present time a man seldom gets title to his homestead before from 7 to 10 years after he makes his filing.

The natural result of this system is shown in the report just published by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which states that the number of original entries on the public domain have fallen off 33⅓ per cent in the past year. And I believe the records will show they have diminished in a greater ratio this year than last. So that if our country is going to try to continue the policy of settling the West by homesteaders, by actual residents, people who go on there to make their homes and develop the country, we have absolutely got to modify our public-land laws and liberalize and humanize their construction, interpretation, and administration so that it will be possible for a poor man to comply with them. To-day it is rapidly becoming practically a physical impossibility.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the decline in the number of entries has been caused in any degree by the more advantageous arrangements made for the homesteaders in Canada than we have in this country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no question in my mind, and I think there is no question in the minds of the great majority of the people of the West, but what two of the main reasons why good American citizens, most of them farmers, are going to Canada at the rate of from 125,000 to 150,000 a year and taking with them from $1,000 to $5,000 apiece are, first, because of the difference in the character of the land which we have left to offer them; and, secondly, the very great difference between the attitude of our administration and the Canadian Government officials toward the people who desire to take public land.

I am coming to a brief comparison between the conditions in Canada and the United States when I discuss the amendments to the law which we are endeavoring to obtain by this bill. We believe that we can so liberalize our own land laws and put them upon something like a par with the land laws of the Dominion of Canada, that notwithstanding they have fine land to offer—that is, land much easier cleared and brought into cultivation—and notwithstanding their land does not need irrigation and our land does; nevertheless I believe if Congress will make these amendments, and if our Federal officials will exhibit a more hospitable spirit toward intending settlers, that we can undoubtedly check a large part of the tremendous and phenomenal exodus to that country. But there is now very little reasonable hope of inducing many of them to return. We have an advantage in this, that when a man does run the gantlet of our Federal obstructions and finally gets title to a piece of western land and gets it under cultivation and gets a good water right and a practicable irrigation system, if he is not bankrupt and compelled to surrender his claim to pay his debts, his land is worth five times as much as an equal area of the frontier land in Canada.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are many gentlemen who want to speak on this measure, and I will not at this time go into a further discussion of the bill generally, but will refer briefly to the amendments that are pending before the House to-day and which the Committee on the Public Lands have recommended and authorized me to present.

Mr. CONNELL. May I ask the gentleman a question for the purpose of getting information?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CONNELL. Is the gentleman able to tell us what per cent of all these people who are going to Canada each year are homesteaders in their own right and what per cent of them are mere farm laborers? Do they abandon homes to go there? If the gentleman would bring that out, I think it would be of interest.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The information we have, Mr. Chairman, is that a very large per cent of them are homeseekers—people who desire to obtain a home and a piece of land for themselves, regardless of whether they were farm laborers or men with families. While some men have gone to Canada to find employment, the great majority of them have gone and are now going for the purpose of obtaining a piece of land upon which to make a home. They are expatriating themselves from the United States, as they must do, and becoming subjects of the British Government in order to take the land in Canada. Our own patriotism and national pride prompt us to believe that they would not leave their native land and desert their own flag and enlist under another unless there was some very strong reason for their so doing. The impulse and hope of obtaining a home and a piece of land upon which to maintain a livelihood and raise a family are certainly of the noblest instincts of the human race. It has always heretofore been encouraged in this country, and with wonderfully beneficial results. And while they do not seem to realize the fact, we of the West know that the administration of our public-land laws has drifted far away from that wise and beneficent policy of encourging the settlement of our vacant lands; and we feel that public policy and the present conditions demand that we should, as speedily as possible, begin to liberalize our land laws and ameliorate the construction of them, to the end that the settlement and development of the West may continue as in former years. We are not advocating any changes that will permit of any frauds. We of the West are just as much, in fact more, opposed to any violation of the land laws than you of the East are. But we do not believe it is at all necessary to make the laws and their administration so harsh and drastic that they drive out or keep away a thousand honest homeseekers in order to keep out one speculator who would, if he could, get a piece of land without in good faith complying with the law.

But I will take up and endeavor to explain the amendments to the Senate bill which were prepared by the subcommittee and were approved by the entire Public Lands Committee, and on behalf of that committee I am directed to report them.

THE HOMESTEAD LAW.

I presume all of you know that the present homestead law requires a residence of five years before a man can prove up. The first and greatest change which we desire to make in this law is to reduce the homestead-residence period from five to three years. It is three years in the Dominion of Canada and in Texas, and we believe that three years is a long enough time for a man to demonstrate his good faith and to establish a permanent residence upon his claim. We believe that under existing conditions very much better results will be obtained by allowing a man to secure his patent, or at least receive his receiver's receipt at the end of three years than to compel him to wait five years before he can prove up. There are many reasons for that. Ordinarily a poor man has no basis of credit or financial standing upon which to obtain means to improve his land until he has some assurance of being able to get title to his land from the Government. But I will not go into these reasons in detail now. That is the first amendment we offer.

The second amendment is one which unconditionally allows a five months' leave of absence from the land during each one of the three years. The Canadian homestead law allows six months' leave of absence each year; but the Committee on the Public Lands believes that five months each year is sufficient. It is imperatively necessary that a poor man be allowed to go away from his claim to get work to make a living and earn something with which to improve his place. The land seldom produces anything to make any money out of during the first two years. And if he has children he must be allowed to go away to send them to school. And in the mountainous portions of the West the winters are so severe and the snows so deep that he can not do much on his place anyway during the first winters on the land. In fact, Congress nearly every year passes a special act granting a leave of absence during the winter to all homestead entrymen. We believe the period of absence should be definite and certain, instead of leaving it to the uncertainty of congressional action, of which the settlers are not always advised. They should know definitely what they can rely upon and not be compelled to watch and await the uncertain action of Congress each year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman explain the effect of the amendments in the bill to which he just referred in reference to residence as to what constitutes residence? What is the change of the law in that part of the bill which proposes to define what constitutes residence by declaring that the presence of the entryman or his family constitute residence?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the way this bill passed the Senate it provided that a man or his family might be absent from the land 6 months each year. When he appeared before the Committee on the Public Lands the Secretary of the Interior very vigorously objected to that provision on the ground, as he claimed, that if we allowed an absence of 6 months each year, under the existing rulings, he might be away a large part of the rest of the time, and consequently that he might be able to make final proof, not in 18 months' actual residence, but on possibly 9 months' actual residence. So the committee, largely in deference to the objections of the Secretary of the Interior, changed that provision from permissive absence of 6 months to the requirement of an affirmative presence on the land for 7 months each year.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the language of the committee amendment is that the presence of said entryman or of his family on the land, and so forth, shall be sufficient to constitute the residence required by this section. Does that mean that the entryman would be required to be physically present on the land during the seven months, or that if he were not present his entire family would have to be physically present on the land?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, we used the word "presence" virtually to compel actual residence of the man or his family on the land, because the Secretary seemed to feel that if we used the word "residence" that he might have a nominal residence there during that seven months and hardly be there at all. In other words, we were willing to accept a provision that would practically compel either the man or his family to actually be on the land substantially all of seven months in each year.

Mr. MANN. What is meant by the term "or his family"? Suppose the entryman were absent for the five months allowed under this bill, and then absent for the seven months—the rest of the year—how many of his family would have to be on the land for the seven months?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that the committee is not set in the language which it has used as to that amendment. We feel that a man ought to reside on his land as much of the seven months as it is possible for him to do. But we of the West know that very trifling absences are sometimes taken advantage of to contest a man's entry. Even where he merely goes to town to get the mail, or to buy a load of groceries, or to help his neighbor thresh, or something of that kind, where he is only temporarily off of the land. That is a little overdrawn, but not very much. Sometimes in such cases some agent comes along and finds the homesteader away and reports the land vacant and abandoned, and the entryman is put to a great deal of expense and hardship to prove his continuous residence. A man's wife may have to go away to send the children to school, or on account of sickness, or various reasons, and the committee thought if we compelled the presence of either the man or his family practically all the time during the seven months it would meet all reasonable requirements. We can not assume that a man is going to abandon his wife, or live away from her for seven months every year, just to work or be at some other place. I think the language of that amendment could be much improved upon, and I hope it will be, because I know the committee will not object. But I have reported the bill, and I am presenting it to the House in the language and form in which I am authorized and directed to do. If there is any other language that will carry out our intent any better or more effectively than this, neither the committee nor I have any objection to it. We only want actual residence on the land seven months in each year.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but I am trying to arrive at the meaning of the language in the bill. Of course, if the entryman remains physically present on the land for seven months that is disposed of. But supposing he does not. Will his entire family then have to remain on the land? Or is there any construction or any regulation of the department as to what constitutes a man's family, who would have to remain on the land in his absence?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I suppose there are constructions as to what constitutes a man's family. But constructions change so much these days that it is pretty hard to tell. The Interior Department seems to be tightening up its rulings all the time and making them more drastic, and as the conditions in the West become much harder for the homesteader to get title the constructions and regulations become stricter all the time and more and more impossible to comply with. For an 8-line law there are 10 pages of regulations.

Mr. MANN. As I recall the letter of the Secretary of the Interior on this bill, he suggested that this language in the bill would require the department to tighten up the regulations or the rulings in reference to presence on the land; that under existing regulations a man might be absent temporarily, and that temporary absence might be counted against him; but under this provision it might be held that the man was compelled to be physically on the land all of the seven months; or, under the terms of the bill, if he were absent, his family would have to be physically present on the land all of the seven months. Now, is there any construction as to what his family consists of—any construction by the department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can not say that there is any construction of the department that would cover this case. It should, of course; and, I presume, it would be a common-sense construction. If a man's wife was there, or if his children were there, or the major portion of them were there, or even if his wife alone was there, I apprehend that would or should be considered the presence of the family. If a man has 10 children and 1 was away sick, that should not deprive the family residence of legality. But the Secretary believes that we ought to revert to the language of the Senate on this amendment; and, so far as our committee is concerned, we have no objection to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. NORRIS. On second thought I believe the gentleman had already anticipated the substance of my question before I interrupted him, so I will not interrupt him now.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Would the gentleman object to striking out the words "the presence of himself and family" and insert in place of that phrase the word "residence"? I can not seen any good reason for exchanging the requirement of residence, which everybody understands and which has a well-defined meaning in the law, for a term as to which nobody knows what it means. Nobody can tell what the department will construe "presence" to mean in the law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that personally I have no objection to the proposed change. But we have not yet reached the point where amendments can be offered to the bill. When we do reach that time in this consideration I will confer with the members of the committee, especially those from the West, and ascertain if they have any objection to the change. Personally, I see no objection to it at the present time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If the change in the pending bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] be not agreed to, do you not make the provision in the bill much harsher on the homesteaders of the United States than are the requirements on the Canadian homesteader at the present time, and would it not be favorable to your people of the West to agree to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Personally, I see no objection to that amendment. I think it is all right, myself. But under the rules of the House we can not adopt or reject or even consider amendments to the bill now. We will take that up when we reach it. I am now merely presenting the bill to the House under general debate, as I am instructed to do by the Public Lands Committee. I am presenting the general provisions and objects of the bill. When we take it up for amendment under the five-minute rule I will be pleased to consider the proposed change.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me by striking out the "presence" and substituting therefor simply the word "residence" we would be going back and traveling in a circle from the point at which we started. As everyone knows, residence is either actual or constructive. It seems to me that that which the proponents of this bill desire to avoid is the constructive residence of the homesteader, and therefore they have inserted the word "presence." It seems to me the word "presence" is very dangerous. It would probably be construed by the courts or by the department to be actual physical residence, and it might be that the homesteader would not be allowed even to go to town for the mail. He would not be present on his homestead for seven months if he was physically away at all during that time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In other words, "presence" means more than "residence"?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. Would it not be better to put in "actual residence" instead of "presence"?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When we reach that point I shall be glad to take up that question with the gentlemen.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman that I am in sympathy with the principle of this legislation, and I desire to ask this question in order to get the viewpoint of the West: Are you in favor of amendments being offered which would hold all utilities and resources, save agriculture, to the Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I am not in favor of making the homestead law more drastic than it is at the present time. We are trying to liberalize it. Under the present law no man can take mineral or coal land as a homestead. He and his two witnesses have got to swear at the time of his final proof that there is nothing of that kind in the land. The Government inspectors look out for that. Our timber lands throughout the West are all embraced within the forest reserves. The waters in the western streams do not belong to the Federal Government. They belong to the people of those States. So, why should we put into a man's patent unnecessary limitations and restrictions that would always be a cloud upon his title and a nuisance to him, and very seriously depreciate the value of his property? There are no frauds being committed anywhere now under the present homestead law.

Mr. COX of Ohio. The only reason why I ask the question is this: In the East, of course, the notion is more or less prevalent that homesteading takes on in some degree the element of exploitation; that people take homesteads presumably for the purpose of agriculture, when, as a matter of fact, they are seeking to get minerals or water power or timber, and that that is the real and primary purpose, rather than agriculture. It is with a view to the removal of that impression in the East, if it is not well based, that I have made the suggestion.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is a matter that would come up, as I say, in the way of an amendment. As to how far the committee would be willing to go in the direction you suggest, I have no authority at this time to say. But our purpose is, and the sole object of this bill is, to encourage rather than drive away the actual settlers. We want to induce our American farmers to become homesteaders and citizens of the West rather than of Canada. The Canadian Government wants the settler, and assumes that he goes on the land in good faith to make a home, and welcomes him accordingly. It does not assume that he is a thief and perjurer and exploiter, who is trying to steal something from the Government and ought to be spied upon and protested and contested and prosecuted and held up and litigated and harassed and driven off of the earth.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would the provision in the bill requiring the presence of the entryman or his family on the land for seven months in each calendar year, and so forth, cover a case like this: Suppose the family were poor, and they had been off the land for five months and had returned to the land. Suppose the man was required by the death of his father or mother and the settlement of an estate, where he was appointed administrator or executor, to absent himself for three weeks or a month to attend to that business. Suppose he had a family, consisting of a wife and five children. Two of the younger children remain on the land with the mother, and the older children are in a neighboring town in school. Would the presence of the wife and the two younger children on the land, under this condition of affairs, constitute the "presence" contemplated in the law, and would it be such as would enable them to make a showing of "presence" that would satisfy the requirements of the proposed law, and enable them to get their patent?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; it certainly would. At least that is my judgment, and it is the opinion of the Public Lands Committee. Whether the Department of the Interior would put that construction on it, I have no authority to say.

Mr. HAWLEY. Was such a question as that raised with the Secretary of the Interior, or any one representing his office, during your hearings on the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know that it was raised just in that form, but, generally speaking, we talked it over with him very fully. The printed hearings are here, and they are quite full.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman think the Secretary of the Interior would hold, in the construction of the proposed law, that such a case met the requirements of the law? Such cases will frequently occur.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I should think so; but if there is any question about it, we ought to cover it by an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman thinks that the Secretary of the Interior would hold that the family would be safe under those conditions?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is not sure, from the hearings?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I can not guarantee what the Department of the Interior would decide.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I inquire whether section 2291, as set out in the report, beginning at the bottom of page 10, is the present law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; that is a recommendation made in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. With reference to the use of the word "presence" in the pending bill, may I inquire who suggested the use of that word instead of the word "residence"?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It was suggested in the subcommittee.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I ask whether the purpose of the use of the word "presence" was to meet possible objections coming from opponents of this character of legislation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; that is exactly what it was for.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Opponents who would say that the real object of the bill was to pass title without any residence whatever?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we thought we were adding a clause that would answer the objections and meet the approval of the ultra conversationists and prevent opposition to the bill on that ground. That is what we were trying to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. While my attention was not called to the word until just this moment, I am sufficiently familiar with this character of legislation and the objections raised to it to suspect that that was the reason the word is found in the bill, and that the friends of this legislation were really overzealous to anticipate this character of objection. I trust that no Member here present will insist that this new and uncertain term be substituted in this law for the certainty which has been acquired by the word "residence" in construction and practice.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am in favor of this measure as I understand it, but I am of the opinion that the law governing the acquisition of title to these public lands by veterans of the Civil War should be made even more liberal than this bill proposes. I want to ask the gentleman what the attitude of the committee and of Members from that section of the country generally is on that question and whether they would be favorable to an amendment which would make this bill more liberal in the cases of these veterans, most of whom are too old and infirm to comply with the provisions of the bill, or to establish residence at all?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. So far as I have authority to speak for the Committee on the Public Lands on that subject, I do not believe they would have any objection to quite liberal provisions as to requirements of residence on the part of old soldiers in the making of homestead entries; but we feel that it is dangerous to try to load down this bill with too many provisions that may, like the one you suggest, be perfectly proper in themselves, but if we should attach them to this bill they might very seriously jeopardize its passage. We are only trying to accomplish a very few things by this legislation, and we do not want to complicate the bill with anything that is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is what I wanted to bring out. I have a separate bill on that question. The gentleman thinks, then, that the better way to go at that is by a separate bill rather than to jeopardize this bill by such an amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I think it would be much better by a separate bill, and I am quite certain the committee will give your bill very careful and, I believe, favorable consideration when you bring the matter to their attention.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Is it contemplated by the Public Lands Committee that the "presence" of the entryman shall be continuous for seven months, or that he may be present three months and absent three months, and then present again four months and absent three months, or must there be seven months' consecutive presence and must the five months' absence be consecutive? How is that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The bill does not say that either the seven months' presence or five months' absence shall be consecutive or continuous. But the committee presumed that, generally speaking, a man would go away in the wintertime to secure employment and earn some money to improve his home and to support his family, and that he would be away practically as long as the law allowed him to, and then return in the spring and live upon and improve his place.

That was really our object; that period of presence and absence would be practically continuous. But I may say that the Secretary of the Interior makes the objection because we do not say that they shall be consecutive. He insists that under this language a man might be there one week and away one week—an off again, on again, gone again homesteader—and that they would have to have a Government agent camping on every claim to check him up all the time. If our ultraconservation friends are worried for fear a homesteader might get off of his claim a few days too much, I have no objection to having a provision that will make it more specific. The only objection is that where you try to make everything so definite and specific that it can not be in any manner abused by anybody, you make it so drastic that nobody can derive any benefit from it.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Is it not the case that the convenience of one entryman would require that he be absent in the summer time, while with another it might require that he be absent in the wintertime? It might be that the convenience of entrymen would require that they be absent at different times of the year and that that is left optional.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we feel that it is important that we should not designate the months that a man may be absent, and we have not done so. In some climates they want to get away in the wintertime, because they can not make any money and can do little toward improving their claims in the winter. But, as far as the practical continuity of absence or presence is concerned, I can see some ground for the contention that the Land Office should be notified when a man goes off, so as to have some system about it and possibly to prevent abuse. I do not think that a reasonable regulation of that kind would be objected to if it could be without expense or delay to the entryman.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. COLLIER. I see that the second paragraph of the bill permits the entryman and his family to be absent five months. I ask this question purely for information, What is the existing law with reference to the absence?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Under the existing law temporary absences are not supposed to be ground for forfeiting a man's claim. And the law provides that he may, by application to the Land Office, obtain a leave of absence for six months and possibly longer. But in order to obtain it he must hire a lawyer, prepare a petition, have it sworn to by himself and two witnesses, file it in the Land Office, send it on to Washington, and then wait six months before he knows whether it will be granted or not. A poor man often can not do it. It is too much handicapped by restrictions and red tape and technicalities to be of any material advantage to the average homesteader; and if he takes the chances and goes off without it, or without waiting to hear from his application, he is liable to be contested at any time.

Mr. COLLIER. And the object of this is to do away with the formalities of obtaining this leave of absence?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. Strictly speaking, the bill does not give him any more right than he lawfully has now. But this bill will prevent vexatious contests, delay, expense, and uncertainty about it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I want to ask about section 2. Suppose under the present law an entryman has lived on his homestead a year, and this bill should become a law, he would only have to live there two more years?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. A great many people have been living on their lands two, three, and four years, and we felt that these men that are on there now in good faith and have made their filings under existing law should be permitted to take advantage of this law if they desire. We used the word "shall," but I think we have agreed that there will be an amendment to make it "may."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Suppose four years ago an entryman made application under the present law, he must live on the land five years?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Suppose for the first three years he has proved actual residence and the fourth year he had not complied with the law, and suppose a contest was pending. Would the entryman get any advantage under this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. If a homestead entryman has failed to comply with the law and a man has instituted a contest against him before this law takes effect, the trial would be had under the law as it existed at the time the contest was initiated. In other words, we can not take away the contestor's legal rights that had been initiated by a valid contest before the passage of this act. But if there were no adverse rights and the Government was holding up an entry on the ground of some slight deficiency in residence this act may possibly be of some relief if it is fairly and equitably construed.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Your provision says that it applies, and if he had actually proved his residence for three years, why would it not give him his patent? Why should he lose his patent simply because he had failed on the fourth year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If he has not complied with the existing law up to the present time, Congress can not validate an invalid entry, especially as against an intervening and valid adverse claim.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my one hour's time has nearly expired, and I must decline to answer any further questions. In the remaining few minutes I have I want to discuss the bill without interruption.

With the committee amendments and those that I am authorized to agree to, the bill will read as follows:

That section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2291. No certificate, however, shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of three years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by himself and by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have a habitable house upon the land and have actually resided upon and cultivated the same for the term of three years succeeding the time of filing the affidavit, and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in section 2288, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then in such case he, she, or they, if at any time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided by law: Provided, That the entryman may be absent from the land for not more than five months in each period of one year after establishing residence, but in case of commutation the 14 months' actual residence as now required by law must be shown: Provided, That when the person making entry dies before the offer of final proof those succeeding to the entry must show that the entryman had complied with the law in all respects to the date of his death and that they have since complied with the law in all respects, as would have been required of the entryman had he lived, excepting that they are relieved from any requirement of residence upon the land.

"SEC. 2297. If, at any time after the filing of the affidavit as required in section 2290 and before the expiration of the three years mentioned in section 2291, it is proved after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office that the person having filed such affidavit has failed to establish residence within six months after the date of entry, or abandoned the land for more than six months at any time, then and in that event the land so entered shall revert to the Government: Provided, That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land: And provided further, That where there may be climatic reasons, sickness, or other unavoidable cause, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

SEC. 2. That all existing pending entries requiring residence upon the land under the homestead laws shall be perfected under and according to the terms of this act.

The language of section 2 should be so amended as to leave it optional with existing homestead entrymen as to whether they perfect title under the present law or under the provisions of this bill, and I hope that change will be made, either here or in conference.

By comparison with the present law you will see that this bill provides for four or five very important and three or four minor amendments.

I have already discussed the two most important amendments, namely: First, the one reducing the residence period from five to three years; and second, the provision granting a definite five months' leave of absence each year.

The third important amendment is the provision making this proposed law applicable to all existing homestead entries. This is only fair and just. It would be an outrage to leave out the pioneer settlers. While we are trying to pass this bill primarily to encourage new settlers, nevertheless I am not in favor of making fish of one and fowl of another homesteader. If any favoritism is to be shown, it should be to the hardy homesteaders who have been out on their claims enduring the hardships of the last two years of drought, and the past winter—the most severe in 30 years. I have a warm spot in my heart for those splendid men and women, and I never want new friends bad enough to mistreat old ones. That provision must be put in this bill, either here or in conference.

The next important amendment is the provision definitely and specifically granting the homestead entryman a six months' period after the date of his filing within which to establish his residence on his homestead claim. That is the intention of the existing law, and has for 40 years been the practice until during the past year the Interior Department has been denying that right. Everyone who knows anything whatever about the West recognizes that a homesteader must have at least six months after his filing within which to build a house and establish his residence on the land. But the bill provides that the three-year residence period required shall not begin until the date the entryman actually does establish his residence.

Another amendment of less importance specifically relieves the heirs of a deceased entryman from residence upon the land in order to make final proof; which is also the intent of the present law, but is another of the strict and harsh constructions that has been recently adopted by the Interior Department.

Another amendment which is merely carrying out the intent of the present law, and is acceded to at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, is the specific requirement of the construction of a habitable house upon the claim.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

Mr. Chairman, the Public Land Committee and an able subcommittee, of both of which I have had the honor to be the acting chairman in charge of this bill, have for nearly a month given the subject of these proposed changes in the homestead law an exhaustive consideration.

We have endeavored to look at the various questions involved from both the standpoint of the Government and the general welfare of the country, as well as from the position of the homestead entryman and the orderly development of the West; and the entire committee, as well as every Member of this House from the public-land States, are earnestly in favor of the enactment of a law substantially in the form of this bill. We are absolutely positive in our belief that the time has come when the welfare of this country imperatively demands the enactment of a three-year homestead law, with such reasonable regulations as to leave of absence and freedom from harassing restrictions as will render it possible for a poor man to locate a homestead claim upon the arid public domain of the West and support himself and family and at the same time comply with the law during such residence period as may be reasonably necessary to show his good faith. Not 1 poor man in 50 could ever possibly comply with the exactions proposed here by the Secretary of the Interior. His recommendations as to "progressive cultivation and improvements" are practically and physically impossible.

I have lived among the frontier settlers of the West for over 40 years, and no one will say that I do not know the conditions or that I do not reflect the sentiment and welfare of Colorado. And from the thousands of petitions and letters and telegrams that I am receiving, I know I voice the sentiment of all the other Western States. There is no use of demanding impossibilities. A poor man can not possibly bring under practical cultivation and irrigation one-sixteenth of his claim the first year, one-eighth the second year, and one-fourth the third year. On a very large part of the homestead claims now being located in the mountainous portions of the West the parts of the claim that can be practically cultivated and irrigated are irregular patches, and often not one-fourth of the entire 160 acres can ever be brought under cultivation. To clear the brush and rocks and break the land and put it in crops often costs as much as $50 an acre. In addition to the clearing and breaking of the land, the construction of a ditch, or the purchase of sufficient interest in some irrigation system, often costs as much as an additional $100 an acre for all the irrigable land a man has on his claim.

We must recognize the actual conditions in the West and not enact a law that nobody can comply with unless he owns a first national bank.

The provisions of the 320-acre enlarged dry-farming homestead law are entirely too severe and drastic as regards its requirements of cultivation. Poor people can not cultivate 80 acres of their claim; and I believe if this House could realize the hardships that the settlers on the dry-farming homesteads are enduring and the privations to which their families are subjected in their efforts to comply with that law that the instincts of common humanity of the Members of this House would force a modification of that law, reducing the requirements of cultivation from 80 to 40 acres, as speedily as the bill could reasonably be passed. I am now and have for many months been doing my utmost to bring about that amendment of the law for the relief of those people, and I want to make this three-year residence law applicable to them as well as to all other homestead entrymen; and I can never agree to increase those hardships and make them applicable to all homesteaders. I would much rather pass no bill at all than to consent to that kind of a requirement.

The average homesteader of to-day is a poor man. He has little or no ready cash. He must make a living for himself and family by his own labor. We must not completely impoverish and discourage him. Under the present espionage of Government detectives he is chained down to his claim and dare not get off for fear of losing his home and all of his property. He must be given an opportunity to make a living by working elsewhere than on his claim a part of each year, and be free from having his claim contested by Government rubber-stamp contests, without giving any ground for it or ever letting the man know what he is charged with. The only human being under the American flag to-day who can not learn what crime he is charged with or have his day in court to determine his rights is the poor fellow who honestly tries to get a home on the public domain. He is treated as an outlaw, beyond the pale of civilized judicial procedure. We want the West to be covered by settlers instead of Government agents. I am opposed to leasing our resources for Federal revenue. We want the public lands and other resources to go into private ownership and pay taxes and help support the schools and the courts and the county and State governments, and build roads and populate and build up the country. We can not build up the country with forest rangers and special agents.

The effect of the present administration of the public-land laws is operating more in the interest of the big cattlemen than toward the encouragement of real settlement and development of the West. The present announced determination of this administration and the bills now before our committee to perpetually hold the public lands and lease them on long leases would be absolutely ruinous to the West. We want the West converted into homes and not held as a United States Government cow pasture for the benefit of the Beef Trust.

It is sheer nonsense to talk about allowing a homestead settlement within leased and fenced cattle or sheep ranges. Any man who would think of taking a claim and trying to make a farm and raise a family within that kind of a cowboy's corral would be not only foolhardy, but would be hunting trouble, and would be sure to find it. The pretense of allowing settlement under such conditions as that is absurd and ridiculous, and is, in my judgment, made only by those who either do not realize the conditions or are not sincere.

It is all very easy for these distinguished gentlemen down here sitting in mahogany chairs in cozy offices, and who never saw the West excepting through the window of a Pullman palace car to discourse fluently and with great dignity and gravity upon what the homestead settlers should do, and how we of the West should be governed. It seems popular with some people in the East. But for one, as long as I am in Congress I will fight against this Pinchot monarchial policy of perpetually holding the West as imperial Crown lands, for Federal exploitation, for Federal jobs, and Federal revenue. This country is not a monarchy yet; and while all power and authority in our Government has been centralizing in Washington at a terrific and astounding rate during the past 10 years, nevertheless, the States have, at least theoretically, still got some rights left, and I emphatically object to the Western States being treated as Federal provinces or insular possessions. We are an integral part of this Government. Our States were admitted on an absolute equality with the rest, and I will resist to the utmost of my ability this infamous scheme of trying to tax and unfairly burden and deprive the Western States of their just and equal rights in this Union. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, during the last half century there have been granted to railroads approximately 115,500,000 acres of the public land, while during the same period there have been in round numbers 900,000 homestead entries gone to final patent which have taken substantially 125,000,000 acres of the public domain. During the past 35 years, since the enactment of the stone and timber law and the desert-land law, there have been patented under the former act about 13,000,000 acres and under the latter about 6,000,000 acres, and during the past 40 years, under the timber-culture laws there were patented about 10,000,000 acres. There have been in the neighborhood of 500,000 acres patented as coal lands and also some other dispositions of the public domain in smaller amounts in various ways.

While there remains in the United States, exclusive of Alaska, approximately 317,500,000 acres of the public domain, and exclusive of about 190,000,000 acres in forest reserves, the fact is that all of these various entrymen made during the past 50 years have had the choice of the public domain and have very naturally selected the most fertile and productive land, and the land most easily cleared and cultivated.

Those 900,000 homesteaders and the entries of thousands of preemption claimants, desert land, and stone and timber entrymen, as well as the railroads themselves, have culled over the lands of the Western States until to-day there only remain the lands that have been during all of these years and up to the present passed over many times and rejected as unfit for cultivation and not worth the effort required for their reclamation. The result is that at the present time our home seekers are not only becoming more and more reluctant to take the remaining isolated tracts of land, but the stringency of the rulings of the Department of the Interior and the construction placed upon the existing laws are, in the judgment of your committee, seriously retarding the development of the West. This statement is conclusively borne out by the very rapidly decreasing number of original entries.

In his annual report for the year 1911 the Commissioner of the General Land Office, at page 6, says:

> The total area of public and Indian land originally entered during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, is 17,639,099.54 acres, a decrease of 8,752,169.55 acres as compared with the area entered during the year 1910.

This statement brings home to us very forcibly, indeed, the fact that during the past year the number of original entrymen, intending settlers upon the public domain, has fallen off 33⅓ per cent. That vividly discloses the startling fact that 55,000 home seekers and home builders that would naturally and have formerly gone out to select and settle upon our public lands have gone elsewhere during the past year. And when the records show that during that year 125,000 good American citizens—the farmers and backbone and sinew of this country—have gone to Canada, and not only expatriated themselves personally, which is by far the most serious loss, but have taken with them at the least estimate $125,000,000, the loss to this country can scarcely be estimated. Canada offers them a three-year homestead upon good land easily reclaimed and cultivated, with a six months' leave of absence each year and most lenient regulations, while in this country conditions have vastly changed during the last few years. This situation is very forcibly realized in the West, and is also recognized by the honorable Secretary of the Interior in his report to this committee.

The Public Lands Commission, appointed by President Roosevelt but a few years ago, reported, in part, as follows:

The information obtained by the commission through the conferences in the West and the hearings in Washington discloses a prevailing opinion that the present land laws do not fit the conditions of the remaining public lands. Most of these laws and the departmental practices which have grown up under them were framed to suit the lands of the humid region. The public lands which now remain are chiefly arid in character. Hence these laws and practices are no longer well suited for the most economical and effective disposal of lands to actual settlers.

The above report was signed by both Mr. Newell, present Director of the Reclamation Service, and Mr. Pinchot, former Chief Forester.

There are no longer large areas of contiguous public land suitable and subject to homestead entry; they are either arid or semiarid and difficult and expensive to either clear or irrigate. It is a rare exception when a man can now find a 160-acre tract of contiguous good or level land. He is usually fortunate if one-half of his claim is capable of being cultivated or irrigated at all, owing to the broken and mountainous condition of the country.

The many thousands of Government contests and protests agaist all forms of entries of public land and the protracted and discouraging delays in hearings seriously retard the development of the West and render the lot of the American homesteader much harder than it should be.

To reclaim and subdue our remaining public lands requires an expenditure of labor and money far beyond what is generally supposed; it requires determination, courage, and energy of a high order, and continuity of purpose, which are characteristics and virtues alone of good citizens.

Under the present law and especially its administration many good men who would make admirable settlers and citizens of the Western States are prevented or discouraged from acquiring the homes and developing the country which would, by the passage of this bill, be opened to them.

Considering the all-prevalent tendency of the population to congregate in the cities, the constantly increasing cost of living, and the uninviting character of and unavoidable hardships involved in the reclamation of the remaining portions of the public domain, it is believed by your committee that to the honest homesteader of to-day greater inducements must be made to settle, cultivate, and improve the remaining public domain than were ever before necessary.

There are a great many reasons that appealed to the committee to favor this bill. It is not deemed necessary to give them in detail. But there is one that does not seem to have been mentioned in the hearings, and yet it strongly appeals to the West in its laudable desire to upbuild the country.

Homesteads are not taxable until final certificates thereon have been issued. The enactment of the three-year homestead law would create an annual revenue for the maintenance of schools and the county and State governments of over $5,000,000 for each of the two years for which taxes would be collected, basing the calculation upon the average number of homesteads now being made, and not considering the increased number which the committee believe would be made under the proposed law.

We confidently believe that if the law is construed in the liberal spirit in which the committee hope and intend that it will afford an impetus to the settlement of the West by home seekers, home builders, and men who will develop our resources and become the producers of wealth and the substantial citizens of the country. The bill is in the interest of the actual settlers who your committee believe will have ample opportunity in three years to entirely demonstrate their good faith and to establish a permanent home.

It should be remembered that as to our remaining public lands subject to homestead settlement, the Government needs "the man on the land" quite as much as the man needs the land. When a homestead meant 160 acres that would all produce profitable crops by the mere turning of the sod, the homestead problem was comparatively a simple one. But now the remnants of the public land in the arid West, the reclamation homestead, and the dry-farm homestead present entirely different and much more trying problems, and if we are to continue to obtain for the conquest of these lands the men best qualified for the work, we must establish conditions which will encourage them in the undertaking.

For these reasons the committee is confident that this legislation will be for the best interest of the entire country, and that the bill should be enacted into law as speedily as possible.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SULZER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4144. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Greeley, Colo.; and

S. 5446. An act relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within the reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bills (S. 317) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sundance, in the State of Wyoming; (S. 318) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Newcastle, Wyo.; and (S. 4493) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Thermopolis, in the State of Wyoming.

Also:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3716) for the erection of a public building at St. George, Utah.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to discuss the bill at this stage of the proceedings, but it has been suggested that it would be well at an early period in the debate to refer to some suggestions of amendments which have been made by the Secretary of the Interior, and I rise for the purpose of doing that. I think it is generally agreed—and the Secretary of the Interior has stated it as his opinion—that a three-year period is sufficient in which to prove the good faith of a homestead entryman.

The only other homesteads on the continent except ours are three-year homesteads. Canada has a three-year homestead law and Texas, which manages her own lands, has a three-year homestead law. So this change is merely coming to the homestead period which the people in Texas have always had and the people in Canada have always had.

There are other reasons for changing from a five to a three year period at this time. One is that homestead conditions are much more difficult than they were in the past. That is conceded by everybody. Another is that we have reached the time when the country needs the man on the land quite as much and in many cases more than the man needs the land. We need in the West to encourage the men who will develop the land, the development of which is expensive and difficult.

Furthermore, we had for many years a commutation law in full force and effect under which the entryman could make proof on his homestead entry after eight months of actual residence. The department a few years ago amended their rulings and held to a requirement of 14 months' residence. When we passed the enlarged homestead law we eliminated the commutation provision, and when we passed the reclamation homestead law we eliminated the commutation provision. The commutation provision is eliminated from what is called the Kinkaid homestead law, so that the only homesteads to which commutation in any wise applies are the old-fashioned 160-acre homesteads.

As to those homesteads, the commutation privilege has been very much curtailed, as a matter of fact almost wiped out, by reason of the ruling of the department to the effect that the provision in the law with regard to commutation is a privilege which the entryman can not exercise unless conditions unforeseen to him at the time of entry arise subsequently, which compel him to avail himself of the privilege. In other words, they hold that if the entryman went on his land with the intention of commuting he can not avail himself of that privilege. I do not believe that ruling is a fair interpretation of the law, but it seems to be the view of the department. From this it will be seen that in the first place the commutation privilege is wiped out as to the major portion of our homestead entries by law. As to the entries to which it still applies, it is practically eliminated by departmental interpretation. Therefore, as a matter of fact, the average homestead period is much longer now than it was formerly. There was a time when in the Dakotas there were three or four commutation entries to one five-year entry. Now the reverse is the rule, take the country as a whole, so that makes the general average of the period of residence very much longer now than it was formerly. The general average of residence will be as long, if this bill is passed, as it was 10 or 12 or 15 or 20 years ago; in fact, as it was 6 or 8 years ago.

I think there is a general consensus of opinion that the main propositions contained in this bill are wise, to wit, the reduction of the residence period to three years, and a better definition as to the right of the entryman to absent himself from the land for a certain period of time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to inquire why the Public Lands Committee raised the period of actual residence necessary from six months, as the bill passed the Senate, to seven months, as it is now presented to this House?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, so far as one member of the committee is concerned, I will say that I agreed to that not because I thought we ought to agree to it, but because I thought there might be considerable objection to the longer period. I want to call attention to the fact that the Canadian law is very liberal in that respect, and I would like to have the committee listen to the Canadian law with regard to residence. This is the second requirement under the Canadian law:

That he (the entryman) shall have held the homestead for his own exclusive use and benefit for three years from the date of entry and have resided thereon at least six months in each of three years from the date of entry or commencement of residence.

It will be seen that the Canadian provision is more liberal than the provision contained in the bill as it came from the Senate. It is still more liberal than the provision that we have reported in the bill.

If gentlemen will take a copy of the bill, I will read the suggestions, the proposed amendments contained in the letter of the Secretary, a copy of which was sent to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

He proposes, on line 3, page 2, between the words "by" and "two," to insert the words "himself and by." There can be no possible objection to this amendment, for it is simply writing into the statute what is now the law by continuous construction since the passage of the homestead law. The homestead law does not contain and never has contained a specific provision that the entryman himself must swear to the facts of residence and cultivation, but the courts and the department have always held that he must so swear, and there is no objection, therefore, to putting it in the statute. We do not change the statute in that respect, because we have changed the general homestead law in as few respects as possible, in order not to have any conflict of decisions.

The second suggestion is that on line 3, page 2, between the words "they" and "have" we insert the following words: "During the first year of the entry erected and the time of final proof." We put in the bill a provision that the homestead entryman must have a habitable house on the land, and the Secretary suggests that we add to that amendment an amendment to the effect that that habitable house shall have been erected during the first year. Certainly no one has any objection to a provision that the house shall be upon the land the first year of the entry. It should be, but the word "erected" should not be in the law. We discussed that in the committee. Sometimes an entryman secures an entry by contest and there is a house already on the land. Sometimes he secures an entry by buying the improvements of a former homesteader, and if anyone can offer an amendment which will make it more definite that the house should be there the first year without using the word "erected" I think no one will object.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Would the gentleman object to putting an amendment somewhat like this—that he, she, or they shall have a habitable house upon the land for at least two years?

Mr. MONDELL. Let me make this suggestion. The homestead period, if this bill passes, will be from three to five years. The entryman may prove up in three years; he is not compelled to for five, and it is possible that the gentleman's amendment would not accomplish just what he desires to accomplish. If the man did not prove up until five years it is possible that under the proposed amendment it would be held that he was not required to have his habitable house until the third year. Of course we do not want that. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, only it seems to me it is subject to the criticism that I have made.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Let me suggest that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota would have reference to the date of final proof.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. So that it would relate to two years previous to the time of offering final proof.

Mr. MONDELL. And if he did not offer final proof until the end of five years he would not be obliged to show that he had a habitable house until the third year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the gentleman says that there might probably be a provision that a habitable house be constructed or be on the land the first year?

Mr. MONDELL. By the end of the first year.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be very easy to provide for that by inserting after the word "they," or after the word "have," the words "during the first year"?

Mr. MONDELL. If that would accomplish what is sought there would be no objection. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MANN. So that it would read that he, she, or they during the first year have a habitable house.

Mr. MONDELL. We must have the habitable-house idea go clear through. We do not want to provide simply that the habitable house shall be there the first year.

Mr. MANN. That part would not bother me. I see no objection to that. I do not imagine that the habitable house would be removed.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that would cover the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the gentleman think that it would be wise to have a provision that that habitable house should be the house that he should prove up by; that he could not put a better house on the last year that he was there?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that would follow.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Secretary's suggestion there practically carries out the idea that the House he proves up by shall be there from the first year, and the gentleman knows, from his long experience in the West, that there is not one settler in a dozen who does not build a new house before the end of his period.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is important, but if it seems important some gentleman will no doubt offer an amendment which will cover that point.

The next suggestion is in line 4, page 2, that the word "actually" be inserted before the word "resided."

There is certainly no objection to the use of that word, because that is the proper interpretation and always has been.

Mr. FERRIS. Where does that amendment come in?

Mr. MONDELL. In line 4, page 2, before the word "resided." Now, line 4, page 2, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and." There is no objection to that, and the only reason why the committee did not do it was that we adopted the homestead law as it now stands, and "or" has always been construed to mean "and." It might be just as well, and perhaps better, to make it clear. Now, another amendment of the Secretary, if the gentleman will follow me. Line 12, page 2, beginning with the word "provided" down to and including the word "section," in line 17, he suggests in lieu of those words the following:

Provided, That the entryman may be absent from his land for not more than four months in each period of one year after establishing residence, such absence to be under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, there are two very valid objections to an amendment in just that form, it seems to me. First, it reduces to four months the period during which the entryman may be absent. We have already reduced the period to five months—the Senate had it six. The present law, fairly interpreted, gives six months' absence. The Senate simply wrote into this bill what has always been the proper construction—six months—but in deference to the view of the Secretary and other gentlemen, we cut the period of absence down to five months. Now, the Secretary suggests we reduce that still further. I think that is hardly fair. I think that the Secretary himself, after considering the matter, will conclude that the homesteader must, under ordinary conditions, be given five months during which he can be absent from his homestead during the year. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] did not seem to be very clear whether the five months must be taken all at one time or divided into a number of periods. It seems to me it is clear it would be construed to apply to all considerable periods during which the entryman was absent. He might be absent for 30 days at one time helping in the harvest field, 30 days at another time helping in the hay field, 30 or 60 days at another time during the winter gaining a livelihood. Four months is altogether too short a period. The present homestead law protects the homesteader from contest for abandonment for six months. In other words, under the present law the homesteader may be away from his land six months and no one can contest him, neither the Government nor his neighbors, and it does not seem to me that after having that liberal provision for all these years during which they have settled the fertile lands of Iowa and Nebraska we should not now say four months should measure the time the entryman could be absent for considerable periods during a year. It is true, of course, that in addition the entryman could be away a few days at a time. Now, a further suggestion, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with regard to this proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will listen to the gentleman with great pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary suggests that this absence shall be under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary. Well, the difficulty about that is that the homesteader never knows when he is going to want to be away. He may live 50 miles from a post office, 100 miles from a railroad, 200 miles from the nearest land office. His request would oftentimes go to the land office by a once-a-week mail; it would go from the land office to the General Land Office at Washington, and by the time they had passed on his request the period during which he desired to be away would have passed. I do not see that the Secretary could make any regulations that would not hamper without doing any good. The entryman must affirmatively prove by two witnesses the facts of his residence and state the periods during which he is absent, and it seems to me that that affirmative proof of three people, which neither the Government or any individual could controvert, is quite sufficient. I fear if we require the entryman, if he wants to go to help a neighbor in the harvest field or wants to go off to work for a week or two, to write to Washington and get permission, such right would be of no value to him, because the time would have long passed before the request was granted.

Mr. MANN. What makes the gentleman think the entryman would have to write to Washington?

Mr. MONDELL. The regulation might provide the local land officers could grant the leave of absence. I doubt whether they would make a provision of that kind, and if they did, there being many homesteaders a week distant from the local officer by ordinary mail, by the time the local officer could answer all the requests for absence the time which the entryman desired to be absent would have expired.

Mr. MANN. And does not the gentleman think it would be a reasonable regulation that the entryman, when he was to be absent from the land for a month or more, would be required to notify the land office?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I have been among homesteaders since I was a boy of 6, and it is my opinion that you can not have any regulation that requires a homesteader to notify some one in advance of his absence that would not cause many homesteaders a great deal of annoyance and difficulty. Homesteaders are not all much given to writing letters, as a matter of fact. Oftentimes an entryman might not know whether he was going to be away a week or a month. Let me again call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the homesteader must prove affirmatively on oath, corroborated by two disinterested witnesses, as to the exact periods of time during which he has been absent. And he is constantly open to a contest by all of his neighbors.

Mr. MANN. Where is that provision in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. The provisions as to proof the gentleman will find on page 2. Of course, this is only a part of the homestead law, and is not the part of the homestead law which would govern contests, but the gentleman is familiar with those provisions.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision of the law now which permits the absence for five months in a year, and so there is no provision of law in evidence to prove it.

Mr. MONDELL. Section 2297 provides that an entryman can not be contested for abandonment unless he shall have abandoned for more than six months, and that is the law which governs all contests, governmental and individual, on the ground of abandonment. A contest affidavit will not be received by the local officers, based on the ground of abandonment, unless it contains the sworn statement that the entryman has been absent from his homestead for more than six months.

Mr. MANN. That is a contest. That is not the proof that the entryman makes. Where is there any provision in the law in regard to that?

Mr. MONDELL. When a man comes to make proof, he has to prove as to his residence. Making proof as to residence, as it has been made since the homestead law was on the statute books, is the proof of the fact that he has made his home upon and resided upon the land, and if at any time he has been away from the land for any considerable period he must in his proof so state. He must state how long he was gone. If the gentleman will read any homestead proof down in the Land Office now, he will find that every such proof contains a statement as to the absences of the entryman—just how long he was absent each time.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any requirement of the law here or elsewhere that will require proof as to the exact time the entryman was absent under the law. But supposing it were, is it not quite certain that if this provision goes in without any notification to the department or without any department regulation, that before they issue a patent in every case they will send somebody to investigate and find out whether the given entryman was on the land for seven months of the year, and that will cause a good deal more trouble to the entryman than it would to comply with some reasonable regulation of the department for giving notice.

Mr. MONDELL. My own personal opinion is—and I do not want to be contentious about it—that it would not. I do not think there would be objection to a special agent going to a homestead at the time of proof or before proof. I do not think there is any objection to taking the proof on the ground. It might be an improvement over the present system. But my long experience leads me to the belief that we would not have a better administration of this law with regard to absence if we had the requirement that is suggested and that it would in many instances be very, very trying to the homesteader. Now, that is my personal view. I think so long as the entryman is required, when he comes to make proof, to prove affirmatively for himself and by two witnesses as to his residence, and that proof consists of proof of the time he was upon the land and as to his absences from the land; this is sufficient.

Mr. MANN. I do not find where anybody has to make such proof under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman knows this only amends 2 sections of some 12 sections of the law.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. Every man here from the public-land States knows—and the gentleman from Illinois is very familiar with these things—that the homesteader in making proof proves by two witnesses that he has resided upon the land and cultivated the same. Now, proof is required, and the gentleman would see it if he examined any proof in the Land Office to-day, that the entryman shows affirmatively the periods during which he was on the land and the periods he was off of the land.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not seem to appreciate the fact that we are changing the law by this bill. We are inserting a provision in reference to an absence from the land where the affidavit required is that the person has resided on the land for three years. But absence for five months shall not be counted as against the residence on the land. Now, the individual who swears to that under this provision of the law is not required to pay any attention to the absence from the land.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, every proof goes into detail. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the liberal provision of the Canadian law. They do not seem to have any trouble up there. They provide that he shall prove he has simply resided on the land for six months in the year. I do not think we would have any difficulty under the more drastic provisions contained here.

Now, to pass to the next——

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that under the Canadian law the officer in charge there can require the holder of the homestead entry to make proof every year?

Mr. MONDELL. There is such a provision in the Canadian homestead law.

Mr. MANN. It was just what I was calling attention to, that at the end of three years there was no way to get out except by sending somebody to investigate, whereas if there was a provision that would require the entryman to give notice of his absence he would be protected from annoyance, and the department would also be protected.

Mr. MONDELL. Most entrymen are honest men, and when they get two of their neighbors to testify as to their absence it is reasonably good proof.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DICKINSON). The gentleman from Wyoming has used 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the Chairman for informing me. All homesteaders are at all times subject to contest by their neighbors if they do not comply with the law, or protest if their proof is not in accordance with the facts.

Now, in regard to the yearly proof.

Our homestead theory is very different from the Canadian homestead theory. We open the lands to homestead entry; the Canadian Government closes them to homestead entry. That is about what it amounts to. When lands become subject to homestead entry in Canada the Government there puts its hand on the land, and no man thereafter can question the act of a man who enters under that law except the Government itself. There is no such thing as the private right of contest in Canada. All of the special agents that we have ever had have never had 1 per cent of the influence in compelling compliance with the terms of the homestead law that the right of private contest has had, because if a man is subject at all times to contest by his neighbors for any failure in carrying out the provisions of the law, no matter how slight the failure to comply with any provision of the law may be, he is constantly on his guard. His neighbors are there all the time.

The special agent may be there once in two years, or once in a year, or once in six months; but the neighbors are there all the time, watching, and if his claim is of value some neighbor is going to get it for a friend or a relative if it is possible to do so. It should be understood that there are a number of provisions in the Canadian law that do not fit our law at all. They do not allow the right of private contest, because the private contestant might come in and take the Government's property on which the Government had loaned money. More than that, they prohibit a man relinquishing for a consideration, because if that were allowed the Government might lose the property on which it had loaned money. So it is apparent that many of these things that apply properly to the Canadian law can not go into our statutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; briefly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that under our law we invite contests, and we provide that the successful contestant has the preference right of entering the land in 30 days on proof that the entryman has abandoned his claim.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and that safeguards the administration of the homestead law.

Now, it is suggested by the Secretary that there should be inserted after the word "resided," in line 4 of page 2, the word "continuously." That is a provision that would make the commuting homesteader remain on his land every day for 14 months, and would not allow him to be gone at all. It does not seem to me that we ought to adopt it; the commutation privilege is not worth very much anyway under present rulings. But it does not appear to me to be a fair provision to say in one line of the law that a man may prove up after 14 months' residence, and in another line to say he must remain there all the time.

Then it is further suggested that there be inserted the following:

In order to comply with the requirements of cultivation the entryman must during the first year after establishing residence cultivate not less than one-sixteenth, during the second year not less than one-eighth, and during the third year and each year thereafter not less than one-fourth.

Under that any provision inserted in this statute is liable to interfere with the provisions in the enlarged homestead law and in the reclamation law with regard to cultivation. All our homesteads now require a certain amount of cultivation, except the old-fashioned 160-acre homesteads, which are scattered around the country. Under the law the Secretary of the Interior now has authority to require the cultivation of a reasonable area of these entries. When the Secretary appeared before our committee he suggested that instead of putting so many limitations in the statute we should leave more to the discretion of the department.

Here is a line of policy with regard to which the discretion of the department is absolute. The Secretary can say that every 160-acre homesteader must cultivate as much land as will show his good faith. I think that is the best way to leave it. We departed from that rule in the 320-acre homestead simply because we were applying it to a peculiar class of land, and we departed from it in the reclamation homestead for the reason that in that case also we were applying it to peculiar conditions. But it is all within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior as to other homesteaders. There the Secretary has full power, and we ought not to take that power away from him. There are here and there in these hills, along the sides of the mountains, and in the vicinity of settlements, places where men are perfectly willing to establish homes, and are glad and are anxious to establish homes upon lands that contain very little soil that is fit for cultivation. They may make a living on such a 160 acres of land. It would be a home to them. Men who spend a considerable part of their time working for their neighbors by days work may live on such lands; men who live in a locality where labor is required and employment is to be obtained in the vineyards and orchards may take such lands in the surrounding hills and mountains. There may not be more than a few acres of good land upon such areas. The Secretary may say, "You must cultivate 10 acres in New Mexico," or "You must cultivate 50 acres in Montana," or the reverse, and he can do as he sees fit within reason. He can make the requirement fit the condition. That is very much better in regard to entries on lands that are not to any considerable extent fit for cultivation than to lay down a hard and fast rule as to the acreage.

Mr. PRAY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. PRAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the hearings, and to say, in that connection, that the Secretary stated that if these rulings were to be made over again the words "and cultivate the same" in the present law would be held to include the entire entry.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman reminded me of that. The Secretary, in his statement before the committee, fully appreciated his authority, and said he could hold that in a given case the man had to cultivate every acre. We want to encourage the taking of homesteads under the old homestead law in many places in the hills and in the mountains adjacent to cultivated areas, where men can establish homes on which they can at least make part of a living and the rest of it by being employed in the locality, and the Secretary can make such regulations as are fair.

Now, the next proposed amendment is, in lines 2 and 3, page 3, insert the following:

No entry for a homestead shall convey any right to any minerals within or under the land covered by the entry, and all minerals shall be specifically reserved to the United States in patents issued upon such entries; and lands whose chief value consists of the timber thereon shall not be subject to homestead entry.

There are two propositions contained there. One is the old English idea that the King owns the mineral. That rule applies in the dependencies of Great Britain.

One of the very first things that our forefathers did when they landed on these shores was to get away from the English idea that the monarch owns the mineral, and they adopted an altogether new rule. They provided that no mineral lands could be entered under an agricultural entry. They must be secured under a mineral entry; but whether lands are secured under a mineral entry or an agricultural entry, after having proven to the satisfaction of the Government that the land was either mineral or agricultural, the title should go to the center of the earth and be a title in fee.

Now, of course it is possible that 10, 20, or 100 years after a homestead entry has been made, a man might find a little clay or a ledge of sandstone or limestone on his land. In one case in ten thousand he might possibly find oil or gas or metalliferous minerals. Are the people of the country losing anything if here and there a farmer, 25 or 50 or 100 years after he gets the title, does find something on his land besides what is on the surface? Do we want to establish the old monarchical principle that, no matter when the discovery may come, the mineral belongs to the Crown? I do not think we do. We have modified, and will continue to modify, our laws whenever it becomes necessary, in order that we may use the surface of mineral lands, giving limited patents reserving the mineral in such cases; but we must do these things as we reach them with reference to the particular character of mineral that we have in mind; because our legislation must necessarily differ in the character of the title conveyed and as to the rights of the Government to proceed to take out the mineral. We have allowed the so-called surface entry of coal lands, simply because we want the surface of those coal lands cultivated, but on most mineral lands the surface is not fit for cultivation. And surely we do not want to confuse things by allowing a man to go upon a gold claim and make an agricultural filing and deliberately separate the land into two estates. We do not want to do that, but under this provision we would be deliberately wiping out the distinction between agricultural and mineral lands. I think for this we shall require legislation allowing a separation of the fee in certain kinds of lands, but a general provision of this kind we should not have at any time, and certainly not in connection with this legislation.

Mr. FERRIS. Some gentlemen are under the impression that the bill reported from the committee changes or modifies in some way the surface-entry bill that we passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted the gentleman to state that that was not the case at all, and that this bill in no way affected that.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill in no way affects the other bill that we have passed, which does allow agricultural entries on the surface of coal lands.

Mr. FERRIS. And in no manner subjects any mineral land to entry that is not now subject to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. And, further, this is a question to meet, in so far as we may need to meet it, not in connection with a change of the homestead period, but in the consideration of the concrete proposition, when we shall reach it, with regard to any particular mineral. There is no more reason for changing the rule when we have a 3-year period than there was when we had a 14-month period under the commutation law.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. There is some reason for doing a thing right while you are doing it, is there not?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know just what the gentleman's attitude is, but my view is that the American people never have and I do not believe they ever will assent to a general proposition of reserving from all patents every mineral that may possibly some day be found beneath the surface of the land. That is the English idea.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. The State of Minnesota, which I have the honor in part to represent, has established that proposition for a great many years.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is a lawyer, and so he understands what a wide difference there is between a reservation by a sovereign State and a reservation by the Federal Government which is limited in its powers. I have no objection to the people of a State making any reservation they see fit. That is altogether a different proposition, it seems to me, and I think the gentleman will agree with me.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I want to say that I do not think it is the same.

Mr. MONDELL. Minnesota is doing what my State is doing in regard to some of her lands, but generally the American theory of title is that it extends from the heavens to the center of the earth, and it is one that should stand, and the exception should be an exception and not the rule; at any rate, it is a question so big that it has no place in a bill where we are shortening the homestead period. Now, the last suggestion of the Secretary is:

If after entry is made and at any time before patent is issued it be ascertained to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior after notice to the entryman and hearing according to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe that the land entered or any portion thereof is necessary for the protection or development of any water supply, irrigation works, reservoir sites, water power, harbor, wharf, docks or landing, the Secretary may cancel so much of said entry as he may find necessary or appropriate for such purpose.

There is so much involved in that suggestion that in the brief time I have I can not touch one side of it. We have no harbor fronts or land lying along streams subjected to homestead entry. The President has full right under the law passed last year, introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT], to make any water-power or other withdrawals necessary. Withdrawals may be made under the reclamation law for canals, ditches, or irrigation works.

A further fact is that patents issued by the Government of the United States specifically reserve the right of way for canals and ditches. All these States recognize the right of condemnation for these uses. The object of this law is to enable the entryman to secure patent more quickly; if we are to subject the entryman to delay while the department searches around to learn if there is not some one of the enumerated reasons for reducing the entry or denying patent, we had better not pass this bill, for it would delay rather than expedite patents.

The Secretary suggests striking out section 2. I have no objection to it. I think the act would be the same with section 2 out as it would if it was in the bill, because I think if this becomes a law, it would apply to every homestead entry which has been made up to this time. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to interrupt the debate at this point to insert in the RECORD a telegram I have just received from my colleague, Mr. FIELDS. I voted for the excise-tax bill yesterday, although I had a general pair with him, because I understood that he was also for the bill. The telegram confirms my impression as to his attitude on the bill. It is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 19, 1912.

Hon. JOHN W. LANGLEY,
Care House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

I am for excise-tax bill. Would vote for it if there. Read this telegram into RECORD.

W. J. FIELDS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that if there be any opposition to the bill, might it not be well that the opponents consume some of the time now? There has been almost two hours consumed by those in favor of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I doubt whether anybody in the House is opposed to the passage of a bill making more liberal the homestead laws or possibly limiting the time in some way to actual residence of three years; whether it should be three years from the time of the entry is another proposition.

I want to make this suggestion to the members of the committee, which is a practical legislative suggestion: This bill is a Senate bill and comes to the House with various specific amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Lands. It is quite evident, I think, that the bill in its present shape, even with the committee amendments, does not meet entirely the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, in whose department public lands are controlled. Whether the views of the Secretary of the Interior in the amendments which he has suggested are desirable to be incorporated in the bill I do not undertake to say. Every gentleman will recognize the practical fact that where a bill of this character is passed by Congress to which the head of the department is very much opposed it is not likely under ordinary conditions to meet the approval of the President.

In the shape the bill now is in, if it were amended by simply accepting the committee amendments, or other amendments which might be offered on the floor, those amendments might be sent to conference, but the entire bill could not be sent to conference. I wish to make this suggestion—that when the committee has finished its work on the bill under the five-minute rule and put in such amendments as it desires to express the views of the members of this committee the gentleman in charge of the bill will move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the measure which has been amended by the committee, so that the bill will go back to the Senate with the one entire amendment of the whole bill, and thereby throw the entire bill into conference. I have no doubt the conferees on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate, working with the Secretary of the Interior, will be able to produce a bill which will be satisfactory both to the House, to the Senate, and the gentlemen who are interested in public-land States, and one which will meet with the approval of the Secretary and President.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, following the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, of course that would come up at the end of the consideration under the five-minute rule. The proposition is, as I understand it, to get the whole bill into conference.

Mr. MANN. To get the whole bill into conference, so that you can properly change it; otherwise, under the rules, the conferees have no control over that which has been agreed upon in both bodies.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that will be a good procedure. As I understand the gentleman, no Member cares to stand up and say that he openly opposes legislation along these lines.

Mr. MANN. Not so far as I know.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to make some arrangement to close general debate and get to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule as soon as possible?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether any gentleman desires time. I do not think general debate would run any length of time.

Mr. FERRIS. I think there are a few on this side who desire a little time, but if each person is recognized for an entire hour the result will be that we will not get through to-day.

Mr. MANN. Then let us make some agreement to close general debate.

Mr. FERRIS. Can we not make an agreement to begin the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule at 4 o'clock?

Mr. MANN. I would suggest that we begin to read the bill before that and allow liberal debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Make it 3 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, there are six or eight who desire to speak on this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. There are three or four upon this side.

Mr. MANN. I understand that an hour is wanted upon this side.

Mr. FERRIS. I want a few minutes myself. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] wants a few minutes, and, I think, the Speaker of the House wants a few minutes. I understand that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] desires 20 or 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I was figuring upon that. Would two hours further of general debate be enough?

Mr. FERRIS. I should think that would be enough.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be now limited to two hours more, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and one hour to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours more, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and one hour by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, in considering a bill of this nature, it is proper that the same rule should be applied by the legislators that a court would apply in construing a bill after it is passed, and that is the reason for the legislation. There has been in the past five or six years a growing belief in this country that the homestead laws of the United States were too harsh upon the small man, upon the settler who goes out to take up 40 or 80 or 120 or 160 acres under the old-fashioned homestead law, or 320 acres under the enlarged homestead act. Like the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who addressed the committee, I have had considerable experience with the public-land laws, and I wish to call the attention of the House to some of the reasons why the homestead law should be made more liberal.

This bill was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Idaho, Mr. BORAH, and, after a thorough discussion, had thereon the 19th day of January, was passed without a dissenting vote. The bill simply refers to a couple of sections of the present public-land laws of the United States. It does not attempt to change any of the general principles or policies which are now sought to be injected into its consideration here in the House. The bill is a simple proposition. It simply cuts down the period of residence that must be put in prior to final proof from five years to three years, and it makes clear and specific the fact that the homesteader may be absent from his homestead five months out of each of those three years. Coming down to the practical question of the administration of the homestead laws by the Interior Department, let me call attention to the fact that when a man makes his final proof he is not yet out of the woods. He does not yet have his title or his patent. At the present time, after making his five-year proof, he is then subjected to inquisitions and to hearings by special agents of the General Land Office, and under prevailing practices it takes a homesteader not 5 years to get title, but from 7 to 10 and 12 years to get title.

The outrages that have been perpetrated upon your fellow citizens who go to the Western States from your States in the East, the outrages that have been perpetrated upon your own friends and neighbors, upon your own flesh and blood, by the manner in which the Interior Department has been administering the poor man's law, the homestead law, during the past six years would surprise gentlemen here if they but knew all of the details.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Before the gentleman is through will he give some explanation as to what, in his opinion, should be done with regard to the classification of lands, whether or not they should be classified as the department suggests, so that only those known as agricultural lands should be acquired under the homestead laws?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has asked me that question, because an amendment is going to be offered here when this bill is read under the five-minute rule which, if adopted, will do more harm than the continuation of the homestead law as it stands at the present time will ever do, with all of its hardships. There is going to be an amendment offered here providing that hereafter no man shall be allowed to go out and file upon a homestead if the claim contains any valuable timber, or if it is chiefly valuable for timber in the eyes of the special agent of the Interior Department who investigates it. Let me call attention to a few practical things. There are no public lands subject to homestead entry in the United States except for one reason, and that one reason is that nobody will go out and take them. Some men seem to have the idea that if we pass this bill to-day, cutting down the period of residence to three years, that people with corrupt intent will go out and acquire title to a 160-acre fertile farm, having upon it a large eight-room house and a red barn, simply by living there seven months each year for three years—a piece of land worth, perhaps, $10,000, or something of that kind.

Gentlemen, use your common sense for only a second. If there were any valuable public lands remaining subject to homestead entry, why does not John Smith or Bill Jones or Harry Brown or any other citizen go out and file upon them? Do not forget that the only lands remaining subject to homestead entry in the United States are lands that have been culled over and passed by as worthless, practically, for the past 50 years, since the homestead law was originally enacted.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I understand the main purpose of the bill now before the House, with the amendments, is to reduce the period of residence from five years to three years and to give the homesteader some latitude as to absence; otherwise the general laws upon the public lands are not affected or intended to be affected by this bill, but this bill is solely to give the homesteader a chance to build his home upon the Government land. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not change any of the public land laws in any way, except that it reduces the period of residence required prior to final proof from five years to three years and gives the entryman the right to be absent five months out of each one of those three years.

Attention has been called to the fact that the Canadian land laws are much more liberal than ours. The Canadian homestead law upon this subject reads as follows:

SEC. 16. Every entrant for a homestead shall, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, be required, before the issue of letters patent therefor, to have held the homestead for his own exclusive use and benefit for three years from the date of entry, to have resided thereon at least six months in each of the three years from the date of entry or the date of commencement of residence, to have erected a habitable house thereon, to have cultivated such an area of land in each year upon the homestead as is satisfactory to the minister, and to be a British subject.

Now, I want to call to the attention of the House a very beautiful prospectus, lithographed in colors, that is sent out under the official frank of the Canadian Government by the minister of the interior. I received the copy I hold in my hand only two days ago under the official frank of the Dominion. It shows on the front page a picture of a farmer going out to his daily work, and on the first inside page the Canadian Government has inserted this boastful statement:

During the year 1910 there were 48,250 homestead entries, as compared with 37,061 in 1909, or over 30 per cent increase. Fourteen thousand seven hundred and four were made by former residents of the United States.

Simultaneous with the issuance of that statement by the Canadian Government we have an official report issued by our own Secretary of the Interior showing that the homestead entries of the United States, instead of increasing 33⅓ per cent, decreased 33⅓ per cent during the past 12 months. Now, our Public Lands Committee considered this bill. They said perhaps there will be opposition to a three-year homestead bill with six months leave of absence. They said we had better cut it down to five months. I want to say to this House that I shall offer an amendment to put it back to six months, the way it came from the Senate, and that is the way it should be passed through this body. I have no objection to the amendment asked for by the Secretary of the Interior that these entrymen be permitted to be absent each year under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, but I do object to his proposition that they be permitted to be absent only four months.

You must remember that a man can not file upon a homestead on the outskirts of any city. He must go into the wilderness and file upon a homestead. It takes him two weeks to get ready to go there. It takes him two weeks to get back to some point where he can work upon a salary, so that four months' leave of absence each year, as recommended by Secretary Fisher, would really only mean three months, and the five months' leave of absence recommended by the committee would really only mean four. Therefore when the bill is read for amendment I shall ask the House to increase the period that the entryman may be allowed to be absent from his claim to six months, the same terms given by the Canadian Government, the same provision that was in the bill when it came from the Senate, and the same way that the homestead law was construed during the time that the great West was brought up to its present standard of development. Now, while we have in Oregon 17,000,000 acres of public land subject to homestead entry, more than one-fourth of that great State, yet no one goes to file on the lands, because they are sagebrush lands or very rough, hillside lands, and the average American citizen is not willing to say he will file upon a quarter section of these lands and spend his time, labor, and energy for five years, and then be held up by the detective division of the Interior Department for five years more before he shall receive his patent. Those are the conditions under which homesteaders have been driven from the public domain of the United States and driven into the Dominion of Canada during the past six years. Sixty-nine years ago the inhabitants of the Territory of Oregon, made up at that time of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and parts of Montana and Wyoming, held a meeting at Champooeg when the right to govern that Territory was disputed between Great Britain and the United States. They held this meeting at Champooeg to determine whether or not they would organize and give their allegiance to the Union Jack or to the Stars and Stripes. A few settlers who had gone across there from Missouri and other Middle or Eastern States were pitted against the French and the Hudson Bay Co.

The meeting was held in an open field in the Willamette Valley. Old Joe Meek, a man who was born in Virginia, who lived a few years in Missouri, and then went to Oregon, was the leader in that open convention for the United States. A motion was made to organize a civil government of Oregon Territory under the jurisdiction of the United States and by the chairman of that meeting, who had been selected by the Hudson Bay Co. was declared lost. Old Joe Meek stepped off to one side and called upon every man who favored the United States to come with him. He demanded a division, and upon that vote there were 52 for the United States and 50 for Canada. [Applause.] I want to ask you gentlemen to conjecture what that vote probably would have been had the pioneers of that day been treated as the settlers have the past few years.

In 1878 the first appropriation was made for special agents. It was only $12,500. It has increased year after year as the public lands grew less, until year before last Congress appropriated $1,000,000 for special agents to harass the poor homesteaders upon the public domain. This year they are going to ask for $750,000, or, in other words, as the public lands have decreased in amount the appropriation for these young men to go out there and ride around in Pullman cars, smoke good cigars, and throw their feet on mahogany desks in the Federal buildings of those western cities, in order to annoy homesteaders, has increased proportionately.

Now, these special agents have been sent out there for a specific purpose. A great many of them have been selected from graduating law classes of the East.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to have the House understand that it is the business of the Department of the Interior to send men out for the specific purpose of canceling homesteads?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I say it is the predominating idea that every special agent has when he leaves Washington, and he gets it from the General Land Office.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated that is what they went for. I understood that they went there to investigate conditions and——

Mr. LAFFERTY. And they try to find from the conditions that the homestead ought to be canceled.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman understand that the Secretary of the Interior sent these men for that purpose?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is an unfair statement, and I do not think it ought to go unchallenged.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I am glad the gentleman has challenged the statement, for I know whereof I speak. I was appointed an agent of the General Land Office myself on the 1st day of January, 1905. I was prosecuting attorney in the State of Missouri. I came to Washington, and the chief of the special-agent division told me he wanted me to go to Oregon and investigate homestead entries in certain areas. He said they were reeking with fraud, and he put me down with several clerks of the special-agent division for instructions, and I got the idea that nine out of ten of these homesteads were crooked and fraudulent and that the holders ought to have their entries canceled, and I went to Oregon imbued with that idea. When I arrived in that State, on the 1st of March, 1905, and went out into the interior and saw gaunt men with ragged clothing and children that were half fed upon homesteads, where they were being held up and harassed, I sent in a report, which is now on file in the Interior Department, saying it was not the 160-acre man that was defrauding the Government, but that it was the timber corporations, scrip people, and railroad land-grant companies. I said then that more liberal laws should be passed.

I say that these special agents should be replaced—these young college boys—with grizzly old surveyors and pioneers, who should be employed as Government agents and stationed at the land offices of the West to meet the homesteader from Indiana, from Illinois, and from other States when they get off the train, take them out and show them where they can file upon a homestead, aid them in every way in acquiring a home, and not have this great and magnificent Government, composed of 92,000,000 of people, the richest country in the world, that owes its greatness to the pioneer spirit of its people, stand up here through its Representatives and say we are afraid our homesteaders are going to perpetrate some great fraud on the Government.

During six years of practice in Oregon I have not found a single case where a homesteader has been prosecuted on the ground that he took his entry for the benefit of somebody else. The complaint of these special agents always is that he did not cultivate enough ground to suit them, or his house was not as palatial as they thought it ought to be.

Here is the difference over in Canada. They give in this document practical instructions. Listen to this just a minute. I want to conclude with the reading of it. Here is this prospectus sent out by the Canadian Government, and our detective department of the Land Office would do well if it would spend some of its time getting up a similar document to send out telling these poor people what to do:

"The man who has less than $300: This man had better work for wages for the first year. He can either hire out to established farmers or find employment on railway construction work. During the year opportunity may open up for him to take up his free grant or make the first payment on a quarter section that he would like to purchase."

And they tell the man who has $600 what to do in this language:

"The man who has $600: Get hold of your 160-acre free homestead at once, build your shack, and proceed with your homestead duties. During the six months that you are free to absent yourself from your homestead hire out to some successful farmer and get enough to tide you over the other half of the year which you must spend in residence upon the land. When you have put in six months' residence during each of three years, and have complied with the improvement conditions required by the land act, you become the absolute owner of the homestead."

Now, if those terms were offered in the United States we would have no trouble. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what I shall say on this bill will be from the standpoint of New Mexico, with whose conditions I am perfectly familiar.

We have a State which is enormous in extent, and which, as one gentleman remarked of the West generally, has had its public lands culled over for more than 50 years. What is left is practically arid lands. We are upon the great plateau of the Rocky Mountains. The land laws applicable to States for which they were originally enacted, like Iowa, and which have brought those States to such a high plane of civilization, the lands distributed into homes for the multitudes, with its wonderful production of all the products of the soil, have made those States especially fortunate—the Middle West, the wonder of the world.

We must not be understood in advocating a modification of the homestead laws as applied to the arid States of the West as making an assault upon the wisdom and success of the homestead laws as operating in the past. Those laws were made by statesmen of great ability who could foresee what the laws would do, and we have the proof before our eyes of what they were intended to do in the happy homes with which those States are dotted.

But such lands are now exhausted. The great wave of immigration after settling the Atlantic coast has with steady progress covered the whole of the great Middle West, and is now reaching out into the arid sections, into what was known, when we studied geography as schoolboys, as the Great American Desert, and they find conditions absolutely different from what they were in these States, which have been so successfully settled under the homestead laws as they were.

This great tide of immigration has overflowed the Southwest as well as the Northwest, has filled up Arkansas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Texas. It has lately penetrated in full force eastern New Mexico, and we who have lived long in that State know that the conditions are so radically different that the original homestead laws are no longer applicable, as the people of my Territory that then was and State that now is have found out by bitter experience.

Instead of grudging to us—if any of you feel like opposing the slight changes in the homestead law proposed in this bill—instead of grudging to us these slight changes, you gentlemen of the Congress which have the destinies of this whole Government in your hands, ought to aid us, ought to inform yourselves fully of the conditions as they are and as we know them.

Do not think this movement is in the interest of speculators or solely for the benefit of the arid States. The great congestion in the cities and in the manufacturing regions of the East and the great Middle West, the longing of many of those who are having such a bitter struggle for existence to acquire homes in the far West, where alone Government lands are yet to be found; also the descendants of the first pioneers who settled up the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and the great Middle West generally—all these citizens of the Republic have their eyes upon the West; and it is in their interest rather than in the interest of those who have already, under great difficulties, tried to settle up the arid States. It is for the overpopulated Eastern and Middle Western States and for the benefit of those who long for homes of their own, and the independence that goes with homes, that we beg you to believe us when we tell you that the changes of the rigors of the homestead law are in the interest of the whole country and not of any one section.

Another thing, the immigration to Canada, where it is so easy, under their homestead laws, to acquire lands, has lately been profiting every year in greater and greater proportion at the expense of the arid West; and this, not because our lands are less fertile, but because the rigorous application of the old homestead law to the different conditions in the arid West have bitterly discouraged these pioneers that have penetrated our borders, and you must be warned, in your disposition to be conservative and adhere to the old forms and prevent fancied speculation in public lands, not to let such considerations as these make you divert the great tide of immigration that is longing to overflow the arid West, of which New Mexico is the center and a typical State, and divert that tide to a foreign country. Is it not a shame that citizens who desire homes under their own flag must go to British Dominions in Canada to find what our own laws deny them?

You ought also to be assured that while once in a while a man tries to take up a homestead with other intention than to make his own home on it, yet such a case is the exception. The vast majority honestly intend to make their homes on the land they take.

I do not care to go into the details of the small changes made in the homestead law, but will leave that to the more experienced members of the committee and of this Congress. The fact is that I consider any precaution that may be necessary to assure that these lands shall be taken up only for homes as not the vital question here. It is that the Members from the Eastern States and the Middle West, who are not acquainted with our conditions in the farther Western States, like New Mexico, should inform themselves and see what we assure you is known to be true from experience, that to refuse to modify the rigors of the homestead law will be absolutely to deny to these States the great good fortune that has come to the States farther east, in allowing them to be filled up with that class of citizenship, the highest in the world, where each one owns a home.

The present bill makes practically only two changes from the old homestead law—first, to reduce the time of occupation and use, before patent can issue, from five to three years, and, second, to allow in each year a liberal absence from the land. Three years is ample to show good faith, especially when it is remembered that a settler on the arid plains of the West has not only to clear his land and plow it and fence it and build his houses, as settlers had to do in other States, but, in addition, he has to brave the terrors of very little rain, comparatively, at the best, and sometimes of a drought extending for an unbroken period of a year or more. The prospect of having to endure these hazards for five years tends to deter the stoutest heart. Many who have exhaustively tried it have had to leave, because, without the extension of credit and title on which to borrow to help him in times of drought, many thousands who have actually tried have forfeited their fences and their houses and their labor expended in cultivation simply because they could not win. Three years holds out hope a little nearer and a little brighter, and, coupled with that, the prospect that if a drought strikes him he can leave the land, either to go back to the States and work for money with which to try again the next year or get work in the neighborhood, in the cities or on the railroads or irrigated sections near his entry.

I do not see how anyone can excuse himself for not supporting at least these changes. They are not nearly what we need, but they are a start and a considerable step in the right direction. These changes will not enable us to fully settle up New Mexico as rapidly as the on-coming tide of immigration would settle it up under more favorable conditions, but they will help.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Mexico yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would not a modification of the existing law benefit many people who do not reside at the present time in the public-land States, people who are living in the States further east, who are seeking homes?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Unquestionably. I was just coming to that point.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will allow me, I was going to say that that is quite true of my State, of Mississippi.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are inquiries for public lands from all over the United States, and therefore this is a question which the Members generally are interested in the same as Members who come from these Western States.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes. I am obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion. We have an immigration bureau in New Mexico, which receives letters and inquiries coming from all over the United States—from as far east as the Atlantic coast, from the congested sections in the manufacturing districts in the East, as well as those westwardly and throughout the Mississippi Valley. You would be astonished at the number of people who are inquiring as to the possibility of getting homes in New Mexico, what the land laws are, how dry farming is succeeding, and so on.

Now, there are other points in which this law should be amended, which other changes, when the powerful Congressmen from the States farther east come to know them as we know them, will be certainly in behalf of honest homesteaders and not in the interest of speculators and the great corporations. The great cattle ranges and sheep ranges of New Mexico of former times are being cut up and in a measure distributed by the inroad of the homesteaders. It was but a few years back that eastern New Mexico, almost a third of it in area, similar in character to the great plains of Oklahoma and western Texas, was the sole and undisturbed domain of cattle and sheep.

I know one city on the eastern plains of New Mexico which six years ago had no being, yet is now a prosperous city of over 5,000 people, and the landscape in every direction dotted with farm houses of the homesteaders. Many of these, unfortunately, have been lost to the original entrymen because of drought and the rigors of the homestead laws of which we are complaining.

In this eastern section the tide of immigration, the forefront of it impelled forward by the thousands behind them, try dry farming, or scientific farming, more properly called. The principle of this system is intense cultivation: First, to make a pan or bottom below the cultivated soil that would tend to hold the moisture from sinking too deep; and, secondly, to so continuously cultivate the plowed soil as to make it like dust to prevent evaporation and hold the little moisture that does fall around the roots of the plants. This takes many times as much labor as to raise a crop where there is ample rainfall, and when the crops fail for lack of any rain at all the settler should have time allowed him from continuous residence to make a living for that year somewhere else.

I have stated that the homestead laws would vastly facilitate the settlement of the arid west and fill it with prosperous and happy citizens the more quickly if further liberalization of the homestead laws be enacted by Congress. I believe that the homesteads in New Mexico ought to be made as large as 640 acres, because what the settler could not reduce to actual cultivation for crops he could use for his private fenced pasturage. That would help him conquer the rigors of his situation and make himself a home.

I also believe that the requirement in the enlarged-homestead law of 80 acres' cultivation each year is absolutely prohibitive of acquiring a title to a settler. I believe that the acreage of cultivation should be almost nominal; certainly not more than would be necessary to show good faith. I believe, also, that the law permitting a homesteader who took 160 acres under the old law should allow him to take an additional 160 acres under the enlarged-homestead act elsewhere than contiguous to his first entry. In fact, this requirement of making his second 160 acres contiguous to his first is unequal in its operation and therefore unjust, because many a homesteader can find no public land contiguous to his first entry, and he is barred entirely as the law now stands.

My experience of almost 30 years in New Mexico makes me feel that liberalizing the homestead law in the direction proposed in this bill and in the direction of the suggestions that I have made will cause New Mexico to become, in a period of time so short as will be surprising to those who still think of that section as the "Great American Desert," one of the great States of this Union—great not only as a mining, grazing, lumber and coal producing State, but also great as an agricultural State.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss this measure at length. I would not discuss it at all, except for the fact that I am a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, and that my sympathies are with this sort of legislation.

In my State there are less than 2,000 acres of public lands. Our people are interested in this sort of legislation only because they are interested in the general upbuilding of the entire country.

This bill has been introduced, and we are seeking to pass it for the purpose of giving to the homeseeker a better opportunity to win for himself a home, and to win it with the least possible hardship. It is a bill which, in my opinion, has a great deal of merit, and will be welcomed by the poor men living all over this land who are desirous of going out into the western country and locating homes for themselves.

When the boy comes into the world he comes into his home. As he grows to manhood the first thing he thinks about, the thing that interests him most, is that he wants at some future time to have for himself a home. After he has grown to maturity and made for himself a home, after he has reached old age and is ready to pass out of this world, the last thought which comes to his mind is expressed in the hope that he may be carried safely to his eternal home beyond the skies. [Applause.]

I say to you, my friends, we are here to-day legislating for the man who is seeking a home for himself and his family. We are told that he can go across the border line into Canada and there receive far better treatment than he receives here upon his own native soil. I sincerely hope that we may change those conditions; that we may make it so that the man who is anxious to secure for himself a home may go out from Missouri, from Illinois, or from any other State in this Union, settle upon a little piece of land, perfect his title by complying with the law, and know when he goes there that he will get that home within the short period of three years.

It is very important that the homeseeker should know exactly when his one great aim is to be consummated. He wants to know that within a short time, say, three years, he will be able to receive his patent from the Government, and that when he has had it recorded he can take it home, give it to his wife and family, and show to them his title to that little farm that they themselves may say, "Now we have a home of our own."

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is the gentleman aware that it now requires at least six months for a patent to be issued after the final proof is made?

Mr. RUBEY. I am aware of that fact, and I am aware of the further fact that under the present laws, and the conditions under which they are administered, when a man makes his entry he has no idea when he will get title to that land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, on last Wednesday I opposed the bill then under consideration, which had been reported to this House by the same committee which has submitted a report on the bill now under consideration. I opposed that measure because I am not in favor of any perpetual franchise grant. I opposed it, too, for the further reason that it seemed to strike at our established policy of conservation.

Conservation, homesteading, and all such questions create substantially the only sectional issue known to-day in this country. The viewpoint is determined entirely by one's local perspective. If we in the East—and I call the Middle West the East, because with respect to these questions we are doubtless dominated by the eastern idea—if we had one-third of the area of the State of Ohio set apart as Federal reserves, we might then be disposed to see the propriety of the viewpoint of the Members from the great western land States. If, on the other hand, you gentlemen of the West lived in the East or the Middle States and saw how the great natural resources of the country had been wasted, then you might appreciate at least the sincerity of our position. Now, since this difference in view does in some degree create more or less of a sectional issue or question, I believe we should approach this measure with a good deal of moderation and with a disposition at least to recognize the other fellow's viewpoint.

And while, as already stated, I opposed the bill under consideration last Wednesday, I am just as earnest now in advocacy of the passage of this bill as I was in opposition to the one of a week ago, for the reason that the bill now under consideration has a broader significance. It has to do with the vital interests of every community in the land. It touches the element of food supply. It comes to individuals in practically every community, because, after all, the great western country attracts many of our people from the Middle West. Their aspirations are centered in the homestead projects.

Let us see what this general situation is in so far, at least, as it presents itself to a Member of Congress east of the Mississippi. We have many requests for information about public lands coming from different classes of people. We find a man, perchance, who has been working for a long time in the shop. He has been able to make a bare living. He sees the absolute hopelessness of any ambition in the matter of acquiring for himself a future competency. Perhaps his children have gone through school, and, their education being complete, he sees in the West an opportunity to gain a home for himself and his wife. Then we have, perhaps, a widow with several children. She desires to have them brought up free from the temptations of the larger cities, and she is attracted to go out West and bring her own up closer to the soil.

We have applications from men suffering from ill health, who desire the best panacea and the cheapest remedy—that afforded by nature. Such a man, perchance, is attracted to the West. Then we have a newly wedded pair, whose hopes and plans carry them out into that great western country. It is essentially the outdoor period, and this tendency is a hopeful sign of the future.

This, I think, practically comprehends the whole situation, and I see nothing in this phase of our present-day life to suggest any conspiracy against the Government. I see nothing which justifies a belief on the part of any person that many of these homesteaders are not inspired by the home-creating instinct. It should inspire the reverse of governmental distrust. The law which this bill seeks to revise or amend is 50 or more years old. We have it from eminent authorities, from ex-President Roosevelt's commission, from the Secretary of the Interior, from Mr. Pinchot himself—and I yield to no man in this House in the estimate which I place upon his unmeasured services for good—in fact, every person competent to know concedes the propriety of the old homestead laws being revised.

It has been shown here many times to-day, and with more force and accuracy than I can state it, that 130,000 Americans, approximately, have gone across the line into Canada within a year.

Now, let us analyze that just one moment. None of us will concede that they look with favor, in the first instance, upon surrendering their citizenship here and becoming subjects of the King of England. We know that is not the impulse which inspires these people to go there. We know that the advantages of climate are not the ruling consideration, but we find, as a matter of truth, that they are going there because the governmental concessions are greater, the laws more liberal.

The man who takes up a homestead in the western country goes there to acquire the very thing which he has not got, and that is material means and resources. He goes on this arid or semiarid land, builds, perhaps, in the first instance a shack. He buys a cow and a pig or two, and time goes on when he must add to the physical equipment of his farm. His energies and the best endeavors of his mind and of his hands have been placed in this little domain which ought to be his own, but the Government retains a string to it.

The time comes when he seeks to borrow money on the substance that he has added to that homestead. Then he is confronted with a singular circumstance. He finds that the assets he has worked out by his own efforts are not accepted as sufficient collateral at the bank. The bank says, "The Government does not trust you, the Government does not see fit to give you this land, why should the bank trust you?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to close with this one thought: When Bismarck came into control of the destinies of the great German Empire he found that the thing militating most against the best interests of that country was the flood of migration from Germany. He sought to stem it, and he did so. How did he do it? He humanized the laws. We say now that we should equalize the land laws. I say to my colleagues that we should humanize the homestead laws. We are making this mistake in our legislation; we are dealing with things in the abstract; we are absorbed with matters impersonal; whereas we should bring our legislation down closer to the human unit, down closer to the activities of individuals and communities. We have, perchance, at times flown in legislative airships very far above the man working out his salvation in the soil. I earnestly hope that this bill will pass. I think it should be amended, however, and all utilities, or substantially all the utilities, except the agriculture, reserved by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, one of the most remarkable phenomena in connection with the population of the United States during recent years has been the exodus of a considerable number of our people to the Dominion of Canada.

These people have migrated from all sections of the country, but more especially from the north Central States. This matter has been referred to over and over again by Members of Congress.

It has been the subject of attention of our magazines and newspapers. It has attracted the attention of the committees having to do with legislation in which Congress is interested. Last year more than 130,000 of our people went to Canada and the year before an almost equally large number.

I have not the slightest doubt—in fact, I am absolutely satisfied—that the difference between the land laws here and the land laws there constitutes the cause for this migration, and that vast numbers of our people go to the Dominion of Canada because they believe that they will better their conditions by the acquisition of agricultural lands.

I realize the great pride that the citizens of the United States take in their citizenship. I realize that no one goes to Canada or to any other country who does not do so with a feeling that a sacrifice has been made by him in the surrendering of all that our country means and that for which the Stars and Stripes stands.

Admitting that the best lands within the United States have been taken and are now occupied as the homes of many people, we are asking the thousands of people who are anxious to obtain homes under the various land laws to accept harder conditions and more severe restrictions than is asked by the Dominion Government.

How strong must be the influences that draw people from the United States to Canada from the standpoint of the building up of a home when they are required to lay aside American citizenship, and how strongly does this suggest that inequalities of opportunities under the public-land laws must be greatly in favor of settlers in the Dominion of Canada than in the United States, else this would not occur.

WISDOM OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Prior to some 10 or 12 years ago it was the policy of our Government to encourage the acquisition of public lands by private individuals under the various land laws. It was regarded that the United States could well afford to part with its public lands with the minimum of cost to the settlers, providing they would be used as the basis for home making, and that as a recompense our country would receive the benefits of a wider citizenship made up of prosperous people with taxable property.

How great the wisdom of those who enacted the homestead law 50 years ago and the officers of our Government who administered it may be evidenced by the prosperous stretch of country extending from the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific Ocean; by the lines of railroad that have been constructed; by the cities that have been built and by the millions of homes that have been established in that land that was looked upon as the Great American Desert when our fathers attended school and studied that part of the geography that told of the great West.

OVERZEAL IN CONSTRUCTION OF LAW.

Some 10 or 12 years ago this policy was modified. It was modified, not by the repeal of the homestead law, but by the reading into the law of meanings and constructions that prior to that time had not been regarded as being comprised within the statutes and contrary to the decisions that had been followed for many years by the department having in charge the administration of the law.

It is probably true that during some periods of the application of the homestead law it was administered in too lax a manner. It is undoubtedly true that some abuses had arisen, largely on account of the administration of the law, and it is true that other land-law abuses crept in, to which the attention of the country was directed a few years ago. But admitting that all this is correct, it does not suggest that in the application of the land laws they stand upon any different plane whatever from the application of the laws touching our revenues, touching our immigration, touching all the various lines of activities with which States or the United States has to do.

In attempting to correct the abuses under the revenue laws we have not stopped the importation of goods from foreign countries, though we have been outraged at the disclosures that have been made in the administration of the laws in New York City. We have not abolished the policy of collecting internal revenues, though we have been ashamed of the numerous instances where the law has been flagrantly violated.

We have seen people enter our country from foreign lands who could in no way measure up to the requirement of those permitted to enter or against whose entrance there was a distinct prohibition, and yet we have not closed our doors to the entrance to the United States upon the part of the desirable people from other lands. Yet when it comes to correcting the abuses in the administration of the land laws of the United States we have not only riveted the attention of the country upon the particular wrongs that have been committed, but in the execution of the law we have swung to such an extreme that the law itself has become a burden upon those who would seek to avail themselves of its provisions.

HARDSHIP UPON HOME BUILDER.

Year after year 20 per cent and more of the persons entering lands within the United States have failed to complete their proofs because the requirements of the law were too hard and they could not meet them. Thousands of others have been compelled to spend of their means, money that they should have used in developing and improving their lands, in trying to establish before the land offices that they had done the best they could under the circumstances and that the charges that were made against them were not founded upon fact.

Last year the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows that not less than 16,000 cases that were investigated by the department were finally passed to patent because the charges that were inquired into could not be sustained.

I do not propose to go at length into the question of administration of these laws, which undoubtedly has been in large part in response to the public sentiment of the East, but I do suggest that the unequal competition between the United States and Canada on account of the administration of the land laws is the largest factor that is responsible for the hundreds of thousands of people migrating from the United States into the great country to the north of us.

More than that, the Dominion of Canada is offering every encouragement to build up its population by drawing from us the high-class citizenship that should remain a part of us.

Instead of there being a call to-day for more rigid provisions being added to our land laws and more rigid interpretation of the laws as they now exist, every reason that is worthy of consideration suggests greater consideration in their application and more reasonable discrimination in their administration, to the end that they may better satisfy the conditions of to-day.

THE WEST STANDS FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT.

The West is as intense against illegality under the land laws as is the East. It would be unfair to say that the citizenship of New York stands for violation of the customs laws, that were recently disclosed in the sugar scandal, and it is just as unfair to assume that the West stands for criminal practices in the administration of the land laws, just because the lands of the East have passed into private ownership and the land laws have application to the Western States.

Those of us who are urging the modification of the homestead law in order that more reasonable terms may be given to the homesteader are as earnest in the protection of our lands against their acquisition by fraud as can be any of our brethren in the East.

I am not here to defend the wrongdoer, whether he be dealing in public lands or in any other business, and I will go as far as any Member of this House looking to the protection of our public domain against those who would perpetrate frauds upon our Government, but I do plead for the honest settler who in good faith, amid stern and severe surroundings, is trying to establish a home for himself and family.

CONDITIONS, OLD AND NEW.

Our best lands are gone. They are in the hands of private individuals, and whatever lands remain are part of the public lands, because they are not so good, by reason of soil, the rugged character of the land, or the necessity for expensive means of subduing them and making them available for agriculture.

It can not be urged that because the settlers upon lands 20 years ago found it to their interest to reside upon the lands constantly or most of the time that this provision shall be arbitrarily enforced upon them to-day. Conditions now are vastly different. Let me illustrate. The very reason that makes it necessary to-day for our Government to provide some system by which reclamation can be carried on in a comprehensive manner as under the general reclamation law and the Carey Act, that was passed by Congress even before the reclamation act was passed, suggests the difference in conditions. The necessity for these laws arises from the fact that the smaller irrigation projects have been completed.

No longer can one settler take up a homestead or a desert-land claim or a timber culture upon the banks of a stream and by his own means or by joining with a half dozen neighbors construct an irrigation system and reclaim the land.

Lands thus favorably located are no longer generally available, and even in places where apparently desirable lands exist water can not be applied excepting by the construction of reservoirs and ditches and reclamation works, at a cost, may be, of hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars.

A single dam may cost a million or two million dollars, a reservoir may cost another sum equally as great, and the canals and laterals to complete the system not less in amount.

The canals and laterals of a single system in my State which has been completed under the provisions of the Carey Act, if added end to end would form a waterway stretching from New York City to Chicago.

Let me make another illustration. In the northern part of the State that I have the honor to represent a condition exists that is similar to the condition that exists in many areas in the West. Much of the land that was taken as homesteads prior to 10 or 15 years ago was land such as is now included within reserves and was covered with timber of various degrees of value.

At that time this timber had little market value. The highest and chief use of the lands did not exist on account of the timber, but on account of the possibility of the lands for agricultural purposes.

At that time the settlers on such lands found it far more satisfactory to live upon their homesteads than now, because of the administration of the laws and the conditions that existed at that time.

In the winter the settler had no hesitancy in cutting timber from his land to be made into lumber or to be worked up into wood, and by that means obtaining a small amount of money, which, in the language of the West, constituted his "wherewithall" for the bread and the clothing for himself and his family.

If he did not make this use of his timber, he made a less worthy use of it by drawing the felled trees up to each other and burning them so as to clear the land. To-day whatever growth may be upon the land can be of no particular assistance to the homesteader for two reasons:

In the first place, there is scarcely any land available for entry that contains timber; and if there were, it would be held to be not in harmony with the homestead law if the settler used the timber other than for his personal use.

Twenty years ago the homesteader and his family desired to live upon the land all the time, and there was constantly a small source of revenue from the land itself, even during the process of clearing it.

Again, vast areas were splendid rolling prairie lands covered with grass that furnished nourishment for cattle and horses during the summer and which even was put up as hay for the wintertime.

The process of cultivating the land could take its time and the vast area of range was available for public use, while the home and the inclosure of the homestead could be used for the nucleus of food supply for the stock of the homesteader and the place where his domestic animals could be fed during the winter season.

In fact, whether upon land that was covered with timber, but available for agriculture or upon land that was prairie in character, it was not a difficult thing for the homesteader to live upon the land almost 12 months in every year, and this he desired to do.

Or if the entryman desired to go away from the land for a few days or a few months to work in the harvest field in the summer time or in the lumbering camp in the wintertime, nothing was thought of this absence, but so long as his main purpose consisted in applying that which he was making for the building up of his home, he was regarded as complying with the law in the spirit in which it was written.

The result of this policy was well-cleared and highly improved farms, and in all the West the most of the land area is owned, not by large landholders, but by the small home builder whose residence is on his land and whose worldly possessions are there.

After all, this constitutes a tolerably good test of a land-law system. No matter what may be said of our timber laws or of our coal laws, no one can successfully contend against the general wisdom of our agricultural land laws and the tremendous good that their administration has brought about. More than this, no one can seriously urge that the homestead law has even been the innocent vehicle in the perpetration of any considerable land fraud.

To-day the homesteader is hampered by not being permitted to dispose of any timber that may perchance be upon his land other than in such a manner as will enable him to build his home, his fences, and make other immediate improvements, as well as provide fuel for the household use. He may cut down standing trees and burn them in clearing his land, but he may not sell the logs or work the tops up into wood to haul to market.

To-day if he absents himself from his homestead, though his purpose may be to earn a little money for the development of his land and for the maintenance of his family, he is not sure that he will not be involved in a land contest charged with having entered the land in bad faith.

His absence is construed against him, and is made the basis of the contest, and it is alleged that this absence is proof complete that he has entered the land for the purpose, not of making it a home, but as the basis for speculation.

I have in mind at this time a case in the hearing of which the Government brought out the total days of absence that the entryman was required to be away from the land when compelled to go to town, about 24 miles away, over bad roads, in order to bring out his provisions, and when he made the trip in three days. I mention this to suggest the extreme position to which we have drifted in the application of our public-land laws.

The fact of the business is, under the old system of reasonable administration, there was, as a matter of fact, greater incentive for the settler to be personally present upon his land, and I am satisfied that in spite of the stricter administration of the law to-day, there was a greater average personal presence at that time than now, because under the present system you make it impossible for him to be personally present all of the time, and then you cancel his entry in denying him patent after he shall have made his homestead proof, because a human being in order to live requires food, and in a civilized country requires clothes.

THE MAN BEHIND THE PLOW.

Mr. Chairman, to cover all phases of this important question would require a good deal longer time than I have at my disposal. I want to call attention especially to the necessity of this bill from the standpoint of the man who will be benefited by it, as he lives on the land. I think I am fairly well prepared to speak from that standpoint, because I know what it is to follow the life of a pioneer, as nearly all my life was spent in the West in pioneer days. I know what it is to fight the forest fires with my neighbors to protect our property and homes. I know what it is to clear lands of logs and stumps and brush. I know what it is to "grub" out the roots of the underbrush, and I have worked at it day after day and followed this up by trying to hold the plow in cut-over land when it was full of stumps. I know what it is to be one of a number of citizens to gather at a new home and help a member of the community to build his house, and we called it a "raising bee." I say that it is from the standpoint of a homesteader and home builder that I especially want to call attention to the benefits of this bill.

RAINFALL-BELT HOMESTEADS.

What are the conditions to-day? The lands may be divided into two classes—those in the rainfall belt and those in the arid belt. The Government has withdrawn nearly all land that is available for forestry purposes in great areas called forest reserves, and there is scarcely an acre to-day available for entry that contains even a small amount of timber that has not been withdrawn and placed within a forest reserve. In fact, hundreds of thousands of acres whose chief use is agricultural have been withdrawn and will be from time to time restored to entry because it is more valuable on account of its agricultural character.

I mention this to call attention to the fact that where hitherto a homesteader was able to make a few dollars every year by utilizing wood or timber upon his homestead, to-day he is denied that privilege. Again, for a man who might acquire a homestead there is little pasture land for the use of his stock in the summer time, permitting the homestead to furnish the food supply for the stock in the winter season. That condition has been eliminated, and in the rainfall belt it is almost impossible to find a tract of 160 acres that has even 40 or 50 acres of good, tillable land upon it. The rest of it is waste. The homesteader simply takes it at this time because it is the best that is available, the best of the public domain having been selected years ago.

DRY FARM HOMESTEADS—PRIME CONSERVATION.

There is another class of land in the arid belt that is farmed without irrigation, known as the dry-farming land, and the homestead law would apply to that. This land is farmed by making the moisture of two years serve the purpose of raising one crop. Just a word with regard to how that is done, because that is prime conservation. A farmer will do what we call summer fallowing one year. After working the ground over two or three times by plowing, with a harrow, and dragging it, along in August or early September he will sow his grain, and as the fall rains come the grain gets a very good start before the winter months put a stop to plant growth. The snows prevent the grain from freezing out, and when the spring opens the grain, with that much advantage that it has over spring-sown grain, is able to grow to fair maturity before the drought of the succeeding months inevitably sets in. The result is a fair crop, even under present conditions, without irrigation in the semi-arid belt. But you must recognize this fact, that the homesteader needs twice as much land there as he would otherwise need, because the land can serve him by producing only one crop every two years.

MAKING THE DESERT BLOOM.

The homestead law, then, will apply to two other classes of lands, both of which are in the arid belt. The first where reclamation may be made by means of private or small projects. The lower lands and benches along rivers and streams in arid regions upon which waters could be turned by the construction of simple ditches and dams were entered for the most part 20 and 30 years ago.

The next class of lands to be reclaimed by private enterprise were those that were situated on a bench or valley under a natural reservoir site. They could be developed and worked into the basis of an irrigation system by the work of a comparatively few settlers. These lands, too, have been acquired.

In my State—and what is true there is true in many States in the West—there exists to-day a certain class of land in the arid belt where individual enterprise will develop a small irrigation system that will fairly suffice for the watering of the land. A farmer, a homestead entryman, will take up a piece of desert land. It lies so high that he will be absolutely out of reach of water that could be diverted upon it by the highest ditch, and he will construct a few reservoirs on his land, from 50 to 100 feet in area and from 8 to 15 feet deep, arranging his reservoirs so that they will collect the surplus water for as large a drainage slope as is possible, and building something like four to six or eight reservoirs of that character upon his homestead. By means of his reservoirs and the use of a gasoline pump and the digging of ditches he will be able to utilize water in the dry season for the production of his crops.

I know of many farms of 160 acres that contain a number of reservoirs such as this on each and that are irrigated during the dry seasons by means of the water conserved during the winter months.

Very little land, however, remains that can be reclaimed in this manner, and whether much or little remains that can be reclaimed by private enterprise the cost of reclamation is so great that any homesteader will have expended, in all probability, not less than $5 per acre and probably more nearly $20 per acre in the construction of his simple irrigation system.

In addition to this, the homesteader needs to comply with the provisions of the homestead law with respect to residence and cultivation. He must build a home for himself, and he will need to build barns and sheds, fences, and other improvements incident to the establishment of a residence.

Wherever lands may be reclaimed in this manner, as a usual thing there is no standing timber and the fuel expense and the expense for all building purposes are large items. The land, as a rule, is covered with a small growth, largely sagebrush mixed with juniper shrub, cactus, and greasewood, and this brush must be cleared away before crops can be raised.

All in all, the lot of the homesteader is a hard one, and I want to say right now that the class of people in my State that arouses my deepest sympathy and pity as I travel among them is the class of people who, in the face of the adverse circumstances that I have tried to indicate, are struggling to lay the foundation of a home.

As a rule the lands that can be taken, under the circumstances that I have mentioned, are miles removed from a railroad and markets, and consequently, even when patent may be issued, it will be some years before the lands will have any great commercial value.

HOMESTEADS ON NATIONAL RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

We now come to the other class of homesteaders under the great national reclamation law. The reason why that law was passed 10 years ago was because private enterprise had practically exhausted its means in the reclamation of lands. The smaller projects had been taken over and had been utilized. That made a condition where the reclamation of the land in any large degree would need to be reckoned in millions and not in hundreds or even in thousands of dollars, and the result was the passage of the reclamation law by the instrumentality of which millions of acres are to-day being made available for homes throughout the western portion of our country, and under a law which contemplates that the homestead entryman shall bear the expense. It is true that the first funds made available were funds received from the operation of the land laws in the public-land States, but that is merely in the nature of a loan, and the money expended will need to be paid back to the Government, and is being paid back by the homestead entryman who makes his home upon the lands. Now, what it is costing? In my State, and what is true there is true in all the West, the simpler irrigation problems have already been undertaken by the Government and those projects are being carried through at an average expense of something like $25 to $60 per acre, that amount being apportioned over a period of 10 years, and the homestead entryman instead of being required alone to comply with all the provisions of the homestead law must, in addition, if he takes only 80 acres of land, pay from $2,000 to $5,000 to the Government for his water rights and his share in the irrigation system. He will have several years to work that out, it is true, but a poor man who goes upon that land goes there with a very serious and difficult task set for him to accomplish, and if he can make good at it he would make good in any country wherever he might be.

Although he gets the land for comparatively nothing, he is required to comply with the provisions of the homestead law touching residence and cultivation and meet the expenses incident thereto, and then he is required to pay such a sum for the irrigation system as in many sections of the country would equal the value of the land.

In other words, in any of the regions where lands may be acquired under the provisions of the homestead law there is the minimum of opportunity for a person who is seeking to obtain something for nothing, and only the opportunity for the person who is willing to give much of his time, much of his labor, and much of the means he has accumulated or that he may earn for the laying a foundation of a home.

THE WEST'S GREAT NEED.

Now, what are we asking in this bill? Mainly the shortening of the time of residence required under the law from five years to three and the granting of a leave of absence of five months out of every year. I want to say that amid the conditions that I have outlined, any settler who is willing to go upon a homestead, live upon it for three years, do the work incident to subduing his land and making it available for a home, has earned the title thereto beyond the peradventure of a doubt. More than that, the provision that grants a five months' leave of absence makes for good and not bad. That is a provision that will make for the acquisition of the land, not by the speculator, but by the actual home builder.

There is some interest in the question of difference between the bill that came over from the Senate and the bill as reported by the Committee on the Public Lands touching the matter of absences.

The Senate bill provided that the entryman might be absent six months out of every year. The Secretary has indicated that, with this language, it would be necessary to strictly construe the law with respect to residence the other six months in the year.

The House bill provides, in lieu of six months' absence, that the entryman shall reside upon his land at least seven months in the year; and I have no doubt that the compromise that the House committee found necessary will provide a large measure of relief to the homestead settlers who are interested.

With the five months' right to be absent that the homesteader may apply at any part of the year, I say it will cause him to live on the land. He will live there for 7 months or 8 months if possible, or 12 months if possible, and he will not be in constant terror lest the mere absence of a little while will cause him to be involved in a contest or result in a cancellation of his homestead entry.

Now, let me say a word in regard to the suggestions of the Secretary of the Interior. I have great respect for the Secretary, and I believe that he earnestly wants to do that which will mean the best for the development of the West; but he he has suggested in his letter to the committee upon this bill, or, rather, upon my bill—which is identical to the one introduced by Senator BORAH—that it would be better not to modify the five-year requirement with respect to homesteads, but grant a two-year leave of absence after the entry shall be made before residence shall be required.

WESTERN CONDITIONS NOT UNDERSTOOD.

Those who urge the provisions of the proposed bill of the Secretary of the Interior in place of the pending measure can not understand the situation that exists in the West.

The proposed bill would permit an absence of two years at the beginning of the five-year period before which patent could be issued to the entryman. It would then require continual residence for a period of three years without any leave of absence being permitted.

This proposed measure can not be satisfactory, and while it might relieve the situation in some respects it would work mischief in others.

Much has been said with respect to relinquishment, and the opportunity for abuse of the relinquishment provision of the law, by those who desire to get control of a piece of land in order to dispose of it to an actual settler.

Frankly, and as one who has lived nearly all his life in the West, I think there is little in this criticism, for unless the first entryman does something to make his entry of more value than other lands he will not be able to get much for his relinquishment from any other settler, because the other settler could find equally as good land upon which he could make settlement without paying a dollar for the relinquishment.

If there is anything, however, in the question of abuse of the relinquishment feature of the law, the privilege of being absent for the first two years after entry would certainly lend itself splendidly to such abuse.

There are times when a settler may find it necessary to relinquish—sickness, accident, a change of conditions, one of a thousand circumstances might make it necessary for any homesteader to relinquish, and he ought to have that right. On the other hand, no one should have the right to make relinquishment a business.

What could be better from the standpoint of a "sooner" than to let him enter upon land and have two years within which to dicker for the sale of his relinquishment? But, again, as I say, I do not think that there is much in this question under the provision that the Secretary suggests or under the law as it is at this time or the pending measure.

The proposed bill, however, granting two years' leave of absence to the homesteader can not serve the purpose that the Secretary desires unless the entryman shall be exceptionally fortunate, or unless he shall be a man of such means as would not warrant him to take the homestead in the first place, or if he did take it, would not need to be absent for two years or any time in order to raise a little money with which to develop his homestead and sustain his family during the next three years.

The homestead law is for the poor man, or rather it should be, and I submit that the average man without means can not in a period of two years of absence from his homestead, under ordinary circumstances, make a stake sufficient to carry him over the next three years within which he will be required to reside upon the land.

The proposed bill that I advocate would require the presence upon the land sufficient to show good faith, improvements that would make the homestead valuable from year to year, and yet would permit sufficient absence to enable the entryman to find work in the busy season in order that he might make a little money to be used in improving his land and for purchasing supplies for his family.

Hence, I say that the provision which has been suggested by the Secretary in lieu of that which is contemplated in this bill can not be compared with it, and will not result in great benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would it not also make it possible for a second entryman to relinquish the land?

Mr. FRENCH. It would be perpetual.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It would be perpetual, and result in speculation in the public domain, which is not permitted now.

Mr. FRENCH. Absolutely not possible under the present law nor under that contemplated in the bill which is pending at this time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to know what the gentleman thinks of the impracticability of the suggestion that the bill be amended to prevent the homestead entries being made on lands that have timber upon them?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, I do not think that would cut any particular figure any more, because practically all the lands upon which there is a growth of timber have been included within the forest reserves; and, more than that, hundreds of thousands of acres of land upon which there is no timber have been included and will gradually be eliminated from the reserves and will be available for homestead entries.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would ask if the gentleman is not opposed to any such amendment as that?

Mr. FRENCH. I would be opposed to it. At the same time we are shaping here a law that may not meet the wishes of all the Members of this body, and we will have to give and take, possibly, to get the legislation through. But I think there is so little timber on any land to which the homestead laws can apply that that matter is not worthy of consideration, and that that limitation is not worthy to be included within the measure we are considering to-day.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In this connection, if the gentleman will allow me, I desire to state that that is probably true of Idaho; but in Oregon, west of the Cascades, there are a great many lands that have some timber on them that are not really forest-reserve lands and ought to be reserved for homestead entry.

Mr. FRENCH. I think if the highest use of the land is for homestead entry that the homestead law should apply to that particular land.

Now, just one more word and I shall have done.

By passing this measure we will be doing much toward making the homestead laws of this country in large degree parallel with the homestead laws of the Dominion of Canada. Right in that connection I would state that we repealed a dozen years ago the preemption law of the United States. That law still obtains in Canada in nearly every Province, and the homestead entryman instead of being required to live on a homestead for five years in most of the Provinces proves up at the end of three years and is privileged to be absent six months out of every year. In addition, in most of the Provinces he has the privilege also of purchasing outright, by making certain improvements on the land, not to exceed 15 acres of cultivation every year, an additional 160 acres at the price of $3 an acre, making, as I said, a condition that is unequaled when it is compared with the conditions we are offering to the homesteaders within our own country.

WHO WILL BE BENEFITED?

Who will be benefited by this legislation? Let me tell you that for the most part the people who will be benefited by it are the people from your State, Representative from Iowa; from your State, Representative from Wisconsin; from your State, Representative from Tennessee; from your State, from whatever State it may be, in the East, South, or Middle West, from which immigration is going to the Northwestern States. These people desire homes, and it is not fair that when they go West they shall be asked to compete on unequal terms with their neighbors in the Dominion of Canada. It is true that these people will be benefited under this law after they shall have gone to the West, but it is true that most persons who will receive benefit of this legislation are from the constituencies of Members of this body east of the Missouri River.

Congress acted wisely when it passed the homestead law, and it will act with great wisdom to-day if it will make that law fit present conditions. This law is in the interest of the home builder. Look to the States of the Middle West and think of what they are to-day. Look to Iowa, to Illinois, to Minnesota, to Kansas, to Nebraska. There you will find cities that astonish the world in the rapidity of their growth. There you will find fields that supply not only the wants of the people at home, but whose grains are sent to the remotest parts of the earth to feed the nations. There, I say, you will find millions of homes around whose firesides are taught the principles of liberty and truth and patriotism and the Christianity upon which our country rests. And yet who will say that these States are not largely what they are because of the policy of the Government in giving to the home builder a free home?

Go, then, to the States that make our mountain country and lie upon the Pacific coast. Great States they are, whose mountains are depositories of wealth, whose hills and prairie lands are vast granaries, whose rivers and harbors are doors to a world's trade. A short half-century ago you saw a prospector here, a hamlet there, a trapper yonder. To-day cities and towns, schools and churches, farms and gardens, enterprise and thrift and industry, these are the striking features of the West that you see on every hand, and they are the splendid fruit of the land laws that our country has faithfully approved since the day the homestead law gave hope and promise to the heart of the poor man.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY].

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is of particular interest to the people of my district, a district that extends about 200 miles east and west and having an elevation of from 1,500 to 4,000 feet. It is composed in the main of tableland, almost level, sloping slightly to the southeast. Twenty-five or thirty years ago this country was almost entirely homesteaded. We had Hugoton, Richfield, Santa Fe, Johnson City, Ulysses, and Woodsdale—some now a memory—all flourishing cities of from 1,500 to 2,500 population. They built their schools, their churches, their courthouses, and other public buildings, and the grasshoppers came, the drought came, and in two years this country and this district and the towns, as promising as any in any other section of the United States, became almost entirely depopulated, and thus remained for 15 or 20 years practically uninhabited and useless except for the people who had cattle and were able to stay, and who fought the fight and finally won.

Within the last three or four years the settlers have begun to go back into that section to build up the towns, until now almost every quarter section has been filed upon and has a family living there, trying to make a home. On account of the high cost of living and the competition in the cities of the East a class of people in moderate circumstances have settled upon those lands and have staked everything they have in the world upon their ability to make a home there. Everything that they have is represented by that piece of Government land, with the little home and the few head of stock they have been able to accumulate.

Since I have been here I have received perhaps as many as a hundred letters from different people residing on those lands asking for some kind of relief from the conditions that exist out there. The last three crops years have been almost total failures for the man on new land there. During the first summer they left their homes and went away to work in the harvest fields for those in the eastern part of the State, and they went back the second summer and again the third summer, and now the limit of endurance has been reached. Letter after letter has been received from them asking if there is not some plan by which they can be supplied with free seeds with which to seed their lands this year, as they are helpless and can not get seed for themselves.

As I understand it, unless they secure a release from the obligation to reside on their premises, they are liable to lose their homesteads by contest if they go away to work to support themselves and families, and if this bill is passed and enacted into law those people will be aided in that way. Most of them have lived there practically the entire three years, so that they can prove up on their land and secure the home which they have earned so fairly, and can then go away from there temporarily, with a chance to make a livelihood.

The proposition now has been reduced to this, gentlemen, that they can not leave, because they have nowhere else to go, and they can not stay, because they can not starve. [Applause.] I think in fairness they are entitled to some kind of consideration. This bill will afford a measure of relief to them. It might be proper for me to say here that ever since about the 14th day of last December nearly every foot of the 32 counties in my district has been covered with snow. That country now has from 2 to 4 feet of snow over the entire western section. The finances of those people are depleted, and in view of the fact that no harm can possibly be done them by the passage of this act it is certainly a matter of exact and strict justice to them that it should become a law. [Applause.]

[Mr. RAKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FERRIS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to give my testimony to the effect that nowhere in the United States is this legislation more needed than in Arizona.

As most of you are well aware, the larger part of the area of my State is desert land, where there can be no cultivation without irrigation. It is true that there are comparatively large sections where certain classes of crops can be grown by a system of dry farming, but any land in Arizona will produce in greater abundance if the flow of some stream or the water from some well can be applied to the land.

When the homestead law was first adopted it was applied to the lands of the Middle West, where there was ample rainfall to produce crops. After the first year, when the prairie was once broken, the homesteader had an income from his land, and the amount of that income was generally sufficient to keep him and his family supplied with at least the necessities of life without any outside resources.

But when the homeseeker reaches Arizona he finds the conditions entirely different. The rule there is that the settler goes upon the land in anticipation of the building of some irrigation enterprise either by the Government or by private capital.

He takes up the land in the hope and oftentimes with an assurance that he will receive water for irrigation in the near future. But the best-laid plans of Government engineers or of the managers of private enterprises are always subject to unforeseen delays. The universal rule has been that the water has not been put upon the land as soon as anticipated. The result is that the poor homesteader, chained to his land by the requirements of the law, must either receive outside assistance in the shape of his own previously accumulated capital or by loans to the limit of his personal credit, or else he must abandon his hope for a home and go elsewhere to make a livelihood, for the land upon which he resides absolutely will not contribute anything to his support without water.

This bill, which reduces the time in which he may obtain a patent from five to three years, will not only lessen the period of his struggle, but the further provision which permits him to be absent from his homestead for five months in each year will be of inestimable benefit. He will then have an opportunity to go into other and more settled parts of the country and there, by his labor, accumulate the means whereby he can devote the remaining months of the year to the improvement of his land.

There are many places in Arizona where water can be developed, either by pumping or by artesian wells, in sufficient quantities to irrigate profitably considerable areas.

But pumping plants and deep wells usually cost more than the limited capital which the homesteader has in his possession. If he can obtain title to his land within a shorter period, he comes that much sooner to the time when he has an asset in the shape of real estate upon which to borrow the money for these most necessary improvements.

We have been told that, by reason of the liberal homestead laws of the Dominion, last year 125,000 American citizens left the United States to settle in Canada, taking with them millions of dollars of wealth. Arizona would welcome such an addition to her population. We are developing our resources so that we will be able to accommodate many times that number of people. We are storing the floods of the rivers; we are boring deep into the earth, and there finding the precious fluid that brings life to a thirsty soil. There are no fairer fields to be found under any flag than can be found in Arizona.

This change in the homestead law is one of the best means of diverting the great stream of emigration which is now leaving the United States and directing its course into the States of the arid West, such as the one which I have the honor to represent.

I will close by reading from an editorial which recently appeared in the Free Press, a newspaper published in Mesa, Ariz. It is as follows:

THE HOMESTEADER'S DILEMMA.

It has been supposed for a long time that the real intent of the original homestead law was primarily to provide a means of furnishing the individual not owning real estate an opportunity to acquire land on which to reside and to encourage him to cultivate the same and become a producer of the necessary foodstuffs. However, locally, in many instances, the apparent original intent of the homestead idea has not only been circumvented, but it has been reversed, until instead of furnishing an avenue by which the entryman needing a home might be recompensed, it has by the many restrictions made the taking up of a quarter section of land a rich man's proposition.

The man who enters a quarter section of arid land, raises a family of God-fearing children, braves the dust storms of June and the hot days of August, builds his home, clears his land of desert growth, pays his grocery bill, waits five years for water, and keeps body and soul together is not only entitled to the entire 160 acres, his original entry, but to a thousand hallelujahs in heaven and the most beautifully gilded, sweetest-tuned harp in the New Jerusalem.

[Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY].

[Mr. PRAY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FERRIS. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] prepared to use some of his time now?

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA].

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of this proposed legislation, and at the beginning of this session of Congress introduced a bill upon this subject, and it has been before the Public Lands Committee with this bill for consideration. I have had hundreds of letters from people in my own State, which is one of the public-land States, asking that I use my utmost effort with Congress to get a bill of this character passed.

In the western part of North Dakota, the State which I in part represent, they used to allow commutation proofs after 14 months' residence, but now under the regulation of the Interior Department as to coal lands—we have lignite coal in North Dakota—they can no longer make commutation proofs. The consequence is that as we have had poor crops in western North Dakota in the past two years, by reason of dry weather, the farmer who has gone there as a settler and who wants to make his proof at the end of 14 months in order to borrow a little money to help him over the hard years, and who must have title to his land on which to get credit, is unable to do so, a fact which has driven hundreds of people out of that country. Now, if this bill becomes a law, and the settlers can make their proofs at the end of three years, then they will have some basis on which they can go to the banks or other places and get money upon their lands to help them at the time when they most need help.

Then another feature of the bill is the matter of the leave of absence. Last August Congress passed a bill to allow homesteaders to leave their claims until the 15th of the coming April, which was a great help and benefit to the settlers in all parts of the West. Under this act they will be allowed five months of each year in which they can leave their claims in order to get employment and earn some money to help them along during the time they are getting on their feet financially and getting established on their homesteads.

This is a good bill; it ought to pass, and I hope that it will. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, and ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, with the general purposes of this bill I am in accord. As to the exact terms which ought to be in the bill when it becomes a law I am not prepared to express an opinion. I hope the suggestion I made some time ago may be acted upon, so that the entire bill will go into conference, with a view to having a bill finally agreed upon which will meet with the approval of the President and the Department of the Interior.

I think no one in the country is opposed to the proposition to give to actual settlers the right to have homes and the right to cultivate the soil and own a part of what is now the public domain. But in enacting legislation of this sort it is quite important, in my judgment, to have such provisions in the law as will preserve to the persons who intend to be actual settlers upon the public domain that portion remaining and not make it too easy for speculators to acquire a portion for the purpose of selling out to some one else, thereby permitting the acquisition of large tracts of land under the control and ownership of some one person or corporation.

Originally, when the homestead law was passed, probably most of the settlers who went upon the public lands at that time did not need or expect to borrow money for the purpose of aiding them either in building homes or purchasing live stock or acquiring machinery for the cultivation of the soil. But in these days, when it has become so much the custom of our people to borrow a portion of the accumulated wealth in order to make use of it, it has seemed desirable to permit the settler to acquire title a little earlier and under easier conditions than he now can, so that he may pledge as security the ownership which he has.

I suppose that is the main object of this bill. No one desires to make it any easier, I think, for men to go from the eastern portion of the country to the West to take up property only for the purpose of speculating in it, but everyone desires to make it easy for those people to settle upon the land and acquire title to it for the purpose of cultivating it and living upon it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to ask the gentleman what he means by speculation; get down to brass tacks.

Mr. MANN. I mean that a good deal of which has been done in the gentleman's own State and elsewhere, where people have gone on the land with no intention of living upon it beyond the time necessary to either obtain commutation or a patent and then sell it to somebody else—where they have gone upon the land with no intention of becoming permanent settlers. If the gentleman does not know what speculation means in his country, I can not enlighten him.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I challenge the gentleman to show a single case in Oregon where a homesteader has been proceeded against on the ground that he took the claim for anybody else within the last six years.

Mr. MANN. I believe we had some cases in court involving that question, where the court did not agree with the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to have the gentleman give us a citation of the case.

Mr. MANN. I have only a few minutes left, and I am not going to bandy words with the gentleman. He is familiar with the case, as I am, and I do not intend to refer to it by name. In passing these laws we should have in mind that the purpose is to permit the man who wishes to live upon the land to acquire it. I know that some gentlemen think that the public domain belongs to the people who live in the State where the domain is located. I do not entertain that opinion at all. The public domain belongs to the people of the United States, who are quite willing to give it away to people who will live upon it and make homes upon it. In order to obtain the money with which to carry on their operations it may be, and probably is, desirable to permit the title to pass from the Government to the settler quicker than is now permitted to be done under the law. I suppose there is no other object, in the main, for this except those places where there are located irrigation projects, and that is only a small portion of the public domain.

Mr. Chairman, in the report of the committee on this bill they refer to the fact that the public domain has been largely and principally disposed of, and that very little of it remains. The gentleman from Oregon a little while ago stated that no portion of the public domain remained except what John Jones or somebody else would not take up to this time. And yet last year, according to the report, there were 17,000,000 acres of the public domain taken up under the homestead laws, as against a total of 155,000,000 acres since the homestead laws went into effect.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the accuracy of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman challenges the accuracy of the committee's report.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Those were under the desert-land entries and all other entries.

[The time of Mr. MANN having expired, Mr. FERRIS yielded him two minutes more.]

Mr. MANN. Seventeen million acres were taken up last year.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Not under the homestead act.

Mr. MANN. Most of it was under the homestead act, against the total of 155,000,000 acres during the past 50 years. Does that indicate that there is any lack of desire of people to take up land under the homestead law at this time? But because people desire to take up land under the homestead law at this time, and because they are doing it in large numbers, and taking large areas of land, it seems to me proper, under conditions to lighten the load that they have been compelled to bear in the past, and make it easier for them to acquire title, and possibly to borrow money for carrying out their desires. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, the Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in the early days of the Republic the Speakers frequently took part in debate. For some reason—I do not know what—that custom has fallen into "innocuous desuetude," to use Mr. Cleveland's famous phrase. I have a notion, not fully matured, to revive it. I do not see why the Speaker has not as much right to make speeches as anybody else, if he feels like it. [Laughter and applause.]

Missourians take an abiding interest in the whole western, southwestern, and northwestern country. [Applause.] The ablest defender that the West ever had in either branch of Congress was Col. Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri, the greatest Missouri statesman that ever lived; and Col. Roosevelt says in his Life of Benton that when a thousand Missourians loaded their wives, children, and household goods into their wagons and went across the plains they settled forever the ownership of what was called the Oregon country; that up to that time the people out there, when it was held in joint occupancy, had been temporary sojourners; but the Missourians were there to stay. In addition to that, the country has been very largely populated by Missourians. [Applause.] They are a prolific race, and they like to go forth to better their condition. Just why they leave Missouri I can not tell to save my soul, but they do leave it. [Laughter and applause.] I suppose I have received over a hundred letters from Missourians in the West in favor of this bill, and I am making these remarks to please them more than for any other reason, except for the strongest reason possible, and that is that the bill is right and ought to pass.

A strange historical fact is that during the entire 30 years that Benton served in the Senate he worked incessantly to make it easier for people to really homestead land and live upon it.

And one of the greatest inaccuracies in history is that the fatherhood of the homestead law is accredited to Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania. Benton worked it out and got every feature of it that was valuable, except that he never was able to obtain for any of his bills the title of "homestead law." The day that he went out of the Senate Galusha A. Grow came into the House. Mr. Grow introduced a homestead bill by title in six Congresses hand running, and got it adopted in the sixth. Benton secured the substance; Grow secured the title, and the historians rob Benton of his share of the glory and give it all to Grow.

Benton's theory, and I am simply following it out, was that the possession of homes—and I believe it with all my heart—or the getting of homes for bona fide settlers ought to be made as easy as possible. [Applause.] The home is the unit of American civilization, and the more homes we have the better for the Republic. The peculiarities under which this bill is presented here are these: With the rich soil of the State from which my distinguished friend Mr. MANN, of Illinois, comes, or of Missouri, from which I hail, just as quickly as a farmer could get the land plowed up he could make a living upon it, and he could make a living upon a very few acres. I believe that Secretary Wilson tells the exact truth when he says that if the Mississippi Valley were cultivated for all it is worth on an average 1 acre of land would support one human being. That would give us a population of 1,250,000,000 souls between the top of the Alleghenies and the crest of the Rockies. But these lands about which the proposition is made in this bill that the period of residence shall be cut from five to three years are not like the lands of Missouri and Illinois. The pick and choice of those lands have been taken up. It is extremely difficult for a man to make a living out there on the 160 acres of that dry land. I once helped the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] get a bill through here to increase the size of a homestead in the western part of the State of Nebraska from 160 acres to 640 acres, and the passing of that bill added a new word to the vernacular of the people out there. The people who entered the 640-acre homesteads are called "Kinkaiders" all over the State of Nebraska. [Applause.] It is impossible, I believe, in a good many cases for a man to make a living on 160 acres of this dry land for five years, the required period under the general law, and be able to support his wife and children while he is living on it during the five years. I am in favor of cutting it down to three years, and I believe by doing so we will render not only the homesteaders but all people of the United States a very valuable service.

To me the most painful feature of the day in which we live is to see a constantly increasing stream of the very best American citizens of this country going to Manitoba and Alberta. On one day in my county, one of the richest and largest and most beautiful counties under the sun, 43 families loaded up an entire freight train, as much as one of these big engines could pull, chartered the train, every one of them in a sleeping car, and pulled out for Alberta.

There was not a man amongst them who was not fairly well to do. Another man in my district sold his farm for $26,000, and his stock and other valuable assets ran the sum up to about $40,000. He moved to Manitoba and entered or purchased 10,000 acres of that land up there. He gave to each one of his eight children 1,000 acres, keeping 2,000 acres for himself. That is the kind of American citizens who are leaving this country and going to the British Northwest. The immigration agent up there estimates that every American citizen who goes over there carries with him, on an average, $1,000. I am in favor of fixing it so that no American citizen will want to depart from the United States to secure a home in a foreign land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER of Illinois). If there is no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2291. No certificate, however, shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of three years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within two years thereafter, the person making such entry, or if he be dead his widow, or in case of her death his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry her heirs or devisee, in case of her death, proves by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have resided upon or cultivated the same for the term of three years immediately succeeding the time of filing the affidavit, and makes affidavit that no part of such land has been alienated, except as provided in section 2288, and that he, she, or they will bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, then in such case he, she, or they, if at any time citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided by law: Provided, That the absence of said entryman or of his family from the land for a period not exceeding six months in any one calendar year shall not be held or construed as interrupting the continuity of the three years' residence required by this section, but in case of commutation the fourteen months' actual residence as now required by law must be shown.

"SEC. 2297. If, at any time after the filing of the affidavit as required in section 2290 and before the expiration of the three years mentioned in section 2291, it is proved, after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office that the person having filed such affidavit has actually changed his residence after establishing the same, or abandoned the land for more than six months at any time, then and in that event the land so entered shall revert to the Government: Provided, That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, lines 3 and 4, by adding, after the word "have," the following: "A habitable house upon the land and have."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire from the gentleman in charge of the bill the purpose of this amendment and in what respect it changes existing law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the existing law does not specifically require any particular house, but the practice is to require one, and the Secretary of the Interior recommended that we put in a requirement of this kind. We have complied with that recommendation, and recommended this amendment requiring a habitable house on the land.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Who is going to make the residence?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is not the amendment under consideration.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We might as well dispose of it now, while I am on my feet. I will ask the gentleman to explain what is intended by this change in the law, and hereafter, where an entryman dies, what the heirs will have to do in order to acquire title?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Under the homestead law, prior to a very recent ruling, when the entryman died his heirs were not required to live upon the land. They have always been required to make the necessary improvements, but not the residence. It very often occurs that the heirs are minor children or infirm people.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman says that was the construction put upon the law until very recently?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. Very recently they have ruled that the heirs must reside upon the land. The gentleman may possibly remember in the last Congress that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] had a case where the Government was canceling the entry because two minor children, one 8 years old and the other 10, could not reside upon the homestead upon which their father was buried, and we passed a bill giving those minor children that land. This is to make it certain that the heirs will not be required to maintain residence upon the land in order to prove up.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is what I wish to develop, because under the law it was held here for nearly 50 years that upon the death of the entryman the heirs might complete the entry by making proof.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Of cultivation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes, certainly; but not by residence. But a construction has been put upon the law in recent years that residence was required, something that was not contemplated by the law, and which seems to me absurd. I am glad to know that the committee has attempted at least to put the proper construction upon the law in that regard.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we have done so, and the Secretary of the Interior approves of this amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should think he would.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether we can arrive at some sort of an understanding in reference to this bill. If the gentleman in charge of the bill, when we have finished the reading of the bill for amendment, will then move a substitute for the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting whatever has been agreed upon in the committee, with a statement that in the House he will, after the passage of the bill, ask for a conference, I think the passage of the bill may be expedited; and it will prevent the necessity of some of us, I do not know how many, offering amendments.

If the committee intended to perfect this bill at this time, I would have a number of amendments that I should desire to offer and discuss; but if it can be arranged so that the entire bill can go into conference, where the conferees would probably, using good judgment, consult with the Secretary in reference to the final draft of the bill before they agreed—I do not say they would have to agree to what he said—why we would be satisfied, I would at least, and I think a number of others, to let the matter go in that way.

Mr. FERRIS. I will just say to the gentleman in that connection that three or four gentlemen on the committee, of course I would not hope to speak of this further than that, have had that thought, have considered that the plan suggested by the gentleman from Illinois was a good plan, and it is our purpose to pursue that plan unless there be some objection coming from a source which I do not now know.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman has it within his power now——

Mr. FERRIS. We intend to make the motion along the lines suggested by the gentleman. Of course, while the bill is here under consideration, and we have an hour, I take it that it is the purpose of the gentleman to perfect the bill as well as we can, so we may have the views of the committee in conference.

Mr. MANN. I think a number of gentlemen will still desire, perhaps, to offer amendments and discuss them, and I do not wish to take up the time of the committee with reference to the amendments which I have prepared if that course is to be taken.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, we think that course is a wise one.

Mr. MANN. I think it is a proper course to take from a legislative point of view.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand the suggestion, and it is agreeable to everybody over here, as far as I know, but we want to get, as far as we can, the views of the committee as a guiding star in the conference committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who desires to ask a question.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the purpose to offer a substitute, the substitute being what may be agreed upon in committee?

Mr. FERRIS. It is the thought that we would draft the bill as nearly as may be and then offer that as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course it would be within the power of the Senate to adopt the substitute, even though they may ask for a conference.

Mr. FERRIS. But the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois was that we would ask for a conference, thereby putting it in conference, and it is the understanding that we would do that.

Mr. MANN. They could still agree to the House amendments, but I take it there is no intention of doing that. I do not think there is any trouble about it at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make some inquiry about the committee amendment that has been read from the Clerk's desk if I can get the floor for that purpose. The proposed amendment requires that the settler shall have a "habitable house upon the land." Who is to decide what a habitable house is under the provisions of this amendment? What is regarded as a habitable house by the inspectors who now visit settlers out on the frontier and on sparsely settled portions of our country?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, the gentleman knows when the matter comes on for final proof before the register and receiver that the question of what is a habitable house, what is sufficient residence, what is compliance with the law, is always a question of fact for the officer to decide, and I take it it would be impossible for me to delineate or attempt to say what would be in the mind of each officer as to just what the holding would be, but the question as to what is a habitable house, to my mind, is one not difficult of construction. It seems to me if it were possible for a man and his family to live during the entire year, during the winter and summer months, in a house in which his family could be made comfortable, my own construction of it would be a habitable house.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that settles the question. If they have lived there through a season or two seasons that should settle the question that they have had a habitable house and that habitable house is upon the property intended to be settled. Such a house may not be comfortable—often it is not. I say, Mr. Chairman, if this language remains in the bill, young men who have never seen the frontier, except as inspectors, who have never slept in a 12 by 14 box house, or a dugout, or a sod house, or a log house, or one of stones without mortar, who have never helped to settle the prairie and arid lands or clear forests, would not think that a man had a home if he merely had a little box house or a little dugout, lighted in the daytime with one window and at night with a candle or coal-oil lamp without a chimney. As the gentleman from Oklahoma knows thousands of honest settlers, even in parts of western Oklahoma, live the year round in a house they have built of cottonwood boards when the boards are green. In 60 days those boards have warped so that they draw the nails and show great cracks that a cat can jump through.

Intending settlers live in that kind of a house when settling new countries. Why, they stuff those cracks with hay in the winter to keep out the cold. I am not talking about a theoretical settler now. I am talking about what has actually been done in new countries by settlers who have cultivated the uncultivated portions of this country on the frontier, and who have pushed the frontier forward from sea to sea. I am not willing that language should remain in this bill which would leave this to the discretion of the agent what a habitable house is and, if he finds the house is not habitable, deny the settler the right to prove up his claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not willing that language shall remain in this bill, or shall be put in the bill, that will leave it to the discretion of anybody to say what a habitable house is, if the settler has remained in it as required by law upon the premises.

Mr. MADDEN. Describe a habitable house.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You can not describe the houses some of these people in new countries live in as habitable.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that, as far as the committee is concerned, we—all of us, I think—substantially agree with him. But the Secretary of the Interior has made quite a number of recommendations concerning this bill. We have had several conferences with him. We have tried to meet his views as far as it was possible without working hardships upon the frontier settlers. This is one of his suggestions that we have acceded to. There were some that were many times more objectionable than this; and we, simply out of consideration for his recommendation, agreed to this one. Now, that is all there is to it. I do not personally care whether it is in or out.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With as high a regard as I have for the Secretary of the Interior, I must say in the passage of a law affecting homesteaders I would rather see to it that the law gives absolute justice to the homesteader than that it satisfied some peculiar notion the Secretary or anybody else might have concerning the kind of a house the homesteaders live in. I have no doubt that there is not an inspector in the General Land Office or in the Department of the Interior who would stay overnight in the kind of houses that settlers live in 365 days of the year out on the frontier. And these inspectors, passing upon what a habitable house is, might say that a little box house such as I have described was not a habitable house, and thereby deprive the settler of the right to perfect his homestead.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I just wanted to interrupt the gentleman from Kansas with the observation that I heard the present Secretary of the Interior before the Committee on the Public Lands refer to the raising of alfalfa as one of the steps in the reclamation of arid lands. Does the gentleman think that an official who would refer to the raising of alfalfa as one of the steps in the reclamation of arid lands has sufficient practical knowledge of that subject to legislate or recommend legislation upon it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I can not be drawn from a discussion of a habitable house to the raising of alfalfa. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, but this recommendation comes from the same source.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The leap is so long from the definition of a habitable house on the frontier to the time and conditions under which you can raise alfalfa that I refuse to take the leap.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman ever raised alfalfa?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I never have.

Mr. MANN. I have; and I do not think the gentleman knows as much about it as the Secretary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I know nothing about the raising of alfalfa. I never raised an acre of it. I have lived on the frontier in a habitable house that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would not leave a cow in over night.

Mr. MANN. I lived on the frontier before the gentleman was born.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the solicitude of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] for the homesteader. I have lived among homesteaders a great deal of my life, and, without being guilty of ego, I will say that I have proved up a claim myself in the last seven years, so I know something about it myself. It is not an onerous part of the bill, or that will be heavy for the homesteader to carry, and this is not a part that they will have trouble with in the matter of construction.

A great deal has been said as to agents who go out there, some of them competent and some of them incompetent. But I do not think any of them would be so wide of the mark that they would fail to let the good faith of the homesteader govern him as to what was a habitable house. One settler proves up a homestead in a box house 10 by 12 feet that cost less than $100. I know of plenty of them who did that.

On another homestead adjoining him a man of more means proves up a homestead with a house costing $1,000 to $1,500, but each anxious to acquire a home for himself and family. While appreciating the spirit of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I think he had better leave some of these things in the bill, to the end that you would get the bill stripped of some of the things in it that a large portion of the House, the Senate, and the public believe ought to be there. This bill should not be stripped of all the safeguards by its friends, because those who are its friends will, in doing that, in truth and fact, be its enemies.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no disposition on the part of the Interior Department, is there, to quibble on what is a habitable house?

Mr. FERRIS. On the lines of the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas, we send out agents and we appropriate lots of money every year to send out special runners to investigate these homestead entries, and sometimes some of these agents have not been thoroughly conversant with public-domain matters. I think some mistakes have been made, but I do not think we ought to sweep all safeguards aside——

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know any case where the Interior Department, through its inspectors, has refused to accept the completion of the entry on account of the condition of the house that the settler claimed was a habitable house?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no doubt that the books are quite full of cases of that kind, and in some cases perhaps rightfully so. If a man erects a house that is not at all habitable and carries on a farcical residence he should not be indulged in that. I contend that as long as a man has a home that is habitable 12 months in the year, whether it costs $100 or $1,000, the good faith of the entryman should not be questioned, and I do not believe, in the main, will be questioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. This amendment does not, in my opinion, change the present law. The department does not now approve a homestead entry unless there is upon the land what they consider a habitable house. So we have written in the statute what has been the ruling of the department from the beginning of the homestead law.

Now, special agents have sometimes been a little peculiar in their views of what constituted a habitable house, but in the main the department is not subject to criticism upon that ground. They have patented many homesteads on which there were sod houses. They have patented many homesteads on which there were log houses, and they have patented many homesteads on which there were indifferent sorts of shacks, where it was apparent that that was the best the homesteader could do, and where it was apparent that it was his home. I do not think there is anything to fear in this amendment, and I think it is a very wise and proper one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 4 and 5 by striking out the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 13, by striking out the word "absence" and inserting the word "presence."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment, by striking out the word "presence" and inserting the word "residence."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that the amendment made by the committee includes all of the changes from the word "Provided," in line 12, down to the word "residence," in line 17. All of the changes in those five lines are in effect one amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the entire proviso down to the word "residence" be considered as a single amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the committee amendments from line 12 to line 17 be considered as one amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer my amendment, then, to the amendment as reported, by unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman's amendment has been offered and is pending, and is perfectly appropriate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13 strike out the word "presence" and insert the word "residence."

Mr. MANN. His amendment is a substitute for the committee amendment. It is to strike out "absence."

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how that can be called a substitute which strikes out of this amendment one word, "presence," and inserts the word "residence" in its stead.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would be very loath indeed to offer any amendment, and I certainly would not press any amendment that would jeopardize this bill by causing it to fall into such disfavor with the Interior Department that the Interior Department officials would feel called upon to exert such influences as are at their command to defeat the bill. At the same time I very much dislike, in order to get the bill through, to load it down with hard conditions and innovations to such an extent as perhaps to make it a burden upon the very class of people we are seeking to relieve. We discussed this matter briefly under general debate, and I do not think it is necessary to consume a great deal of the time of the committee upon the amendment. I think gentlemen all understand that we are injecting an absolutely new and unknown element into this law, an absolutely new and unknown legal term, if I may call the word "presence" a legal term. I do not believe that word is a legal term. I do not believe that any two gentlemen on the floor of this House could get up here now and either agree as to what "presence" on the land would mean under this law or would be able to go out in the Library of Congress and find a definition upon which they could agree. But as to the word "residence," the meaning of that term, its construction with reference to land, has been fixed. It is fixed in the repeated decisions of the courts, and it is fixed in the regulations, and so forth, of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be still better and make it still more explicit to use the language suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, that the entryman may be absent from the land for a certain period without affecting his residence? The gentleman's amendment would have residence used as a part of the definition of the word "residence." The gentleman's proposition would be as follows: "Provided, That the absence of said entryman or his family," and so forth.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague from Colorado will yield, I think I can possibly satisfy the committee on this matter by offering a substitute for the committee amendment and for the pending amendment, to strike out of the bill all of the language in the printed bill, if you have it there, beginning in line 12, including the word "Provided," and striking out everything down to the word "section," in line 17, and inserting in lieu of that language the following:

Provided, That the entryman may be absent from the land for not more than five months in each period of one year after establishing residence.

That will give him an affirmative, definite leave of absence for five months in each year.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And that eliminates the family proposition altogether.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; that eliminates all these other questions about presence on the land, and so forth. I am referring to the Secretary's recommendation.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The only objection to the gentleman's proposition is that in practice it would not permit the entryman to avail himself of the residence of his family upon the land.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The same law would apply then that applies now.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Your proposition would require the entryman himself to live on the land during the residential period.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It cuts out the question about the man's family, and leaves the law as it is at the present time.

Mr. MANN. Where a man may be absent, if his family are there, under certain conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. PICKETT. I notice that the gentleman leaves out the concluding three lines of the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. PICKETT. What was the reason for that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My reason for leaving out the concluding three lines of the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior is this——

Mr. PICKETT. Just read them, so they will go into the RECORD.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior is just as I read it, except that he makes the time four months instead of five in each period of one year after establishing residence, and this is the part which I do not offer:

Such absence, however, to be under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I simply desire to say that I offered my amendment for the purpose of emphasizing my objection to the use of this indefinite word "presence." If the proposition now submitted by my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado] is satisfactory to all concerned, I shall be glad to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Some gentleman has well said that the rules and regulations are largely made by people here in Washington who never saw the West except from the window of a Pullman palace car, and who do not necessarily understand our conditions. They make rules and regulations that are impracticable; and when a man wants to go away from his home he can not hire a lawyer to tell him what the latest edition of the rules and regulations may be. When he knows that the law gives him five months' absence he ought to be permitted to go without any expense or any string to it or any application to anybody or anything else. When he comes to final proof, he has got to make proof as to his residence.

Mr. PICKETT. Assuming that he went away for two weeks at one time, three weeks at another time, and four weeks at another. Should it not be subject to some rule provided by the department, fixing the manner in which he could take advantage of this section of the law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Under the understanding which we have with the minority leader [Mr. MANN], when we get this bill trimmed up as best we can it is to be sent back to the Senate as a substitute and a conference asked for. Now, I apprehend that the conferees and the Secretary of the Interior will get together and provide some method of that kind. The Secretary did not suggest this to me. He suggested that the man merely write a letter——

Mr. PICKETT. I was simply raising the question, because it occurred to me that there should be some further provision.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the chances are that there will be.

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary of the Interior has full authority to make rules and regulations generally under this law. It is his duty to do so. Therefore it is very unusual to place in the body of the bill, after a specific paragraph, a general provision with regard to rules and regulations. It is his duty to make those rules and regulations now, and it seems to me there is no more reason why a provision with regard to rules and regulations should be placed at this point in the bill rather than anywhere else in the bill or after every paragraph in the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I notice that the language of the bill refers to the entryman or his family. The proposed substitute refers only to the entryman. Is there any question in the mind of the gentleman as to whether or not by leaving out the word "family" a construction might be put upon the language that really would not result in granting the absence that is desired? I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that only recently, within the last 90 days, two decisions have been rendered—one in a case where the claimant had been absent a portion of the time earning his living and his family residing upon the land continuously and all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Colorado be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it was held in that case that it was an attempt on the part of the entryman to obtain title to the public domain by his family residing on the land. About the same time they rendered a decision where a family had resided on the land for some time and, lacking school facilities, the wife and mother of the children had gone to a town some distance from the homestead and spent a portion of the school year there in order to educate the children. In that case they rejected the proof on the ground that it was an attempt on the part of the entryman to acquire title by residing on the domain while the family was residing elsewhere. The gentleman is familiar with decisions of that kind.

Now, is the proposed substitute definite enough so that there will be no question about the matter of absence; so that they may hold, perhaps, that the entryman might be absent and the family might not be? I assume that what is desired is that there may be a period, not exceeding five months in any one year, when the entryman and his family may be absent, and it shall not interfere with the continuity of the three years' residence required under the proposed law.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me that there is no question but that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado makes it clear that the entryman may be away for a period not exceeding five months, and as no reference is made to the family the absence of the family with the entryman goes as a matter of course.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say that I favor the substitute in preference to the language in the amendment which has been reported by the committee.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the pending amendment, that the words "and his family" be inserted after the word "entryman."

Mr. NORRIS. The substitute to which the gentleman refers has not yet been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "law," in line 12, and to the word "section," in line 17, and insert:
"Provided, That the entryman may be absent from the land for not more than five months in each period of one year after establishing residence."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move as an amendment to the amendment that after the word "entryman" the words "and his family" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "entryman" the words "and his family."

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Idaho that it will make it worse for the entryman if he puts that in. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado the entryman and his family both can be absent five months. During the seven months the family might be on the land and the entryman might be away as much as he could now be away.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, that which is in my own mind is perfectly clear, and what I wanted to do by this amendment is to prevent an interpretation by the department that might lead to embarrassment or confusion when trying to enforce this law. Some Members from the West, however, sitting around me feel that the amendment itself might lead to embarrassment through some construction, and as this is a matter that will be thrashed out further between the House and the Senate, I will withdraw my amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "six."

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, we have heard here to-day from every member of the Public Lands Committee who has spoken, that they would have left this bill giving the entryman six months' absence each year, except for the fact that they thought it would facilitate its passage by changing it to give him only five months. Furthermore, this amendment is very apt to be further amended in conference by providing that he can only be absent subject to the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior, and that will require time. If we are going to make the homestead laws as liberal as the Canadian homestead law, why not give the entryman six months' absence every year, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary?

As I said awhile ago, that will not mean that he can work six months every year somewhere else for wages, because it will take two weeks to go into his place and two weeks to get back to work, and that would not give him over five months to actually work elsewhere. We have the Canadian law, giving homesteaders six months' absence. There is no demand from any quarter that our homesteaders be cut down to five months. Every voice that has been heard here to-day is in favor of six months. Why not leave the bill in a shape that represents the sentiment of every Member of this House? For that reason I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the Secretary of the Interior is urging that this be cut down to four months, and I hope that the committee will not go further than the amendment making it five months. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not come from the western country, I come from the Southland; I was gratified and pleased in listening to the speech made by the distinguished Speaker of this House only a few moments ago, when he said that we ought to encourage our own citizens to settle in this western country and that we should make the rules and regulations relative to the homestead laws the best possible in order to keep our citizens within our own confines and to encourage them, and thereby prevent so many of them from going into British Columbia or southwestern Canada.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in order to carry out that idea the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] should be adopted. The law has been in the past and is now that six months' actual residence upon the homestead each year entitles a man after five years to obtain a patent. By this bill this committee increased that residency to seven months for no other reason than, it is suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, to extend the time of the residence to seven months and allow the entryman to be absent only five months in the year. I heard great applause, not only on this side of the Chamber but on that side, when the distinguished Speaker of this House said that we ought to make such rules and regulations as would lighten the burden on the homesteader in proving out his entry on your western lands. I thought then that the gentlemen on this committee would try to make laws, rules, and regulations that would encourage them, but when I see this committee by an amendment here making the burden heavier than the law which is now in force and opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY], I fear that the applause was only of a fictitious character. I believe this amendment ought to be adopted, notwithstanding the opposition that some seem to think the Secretary of the Interior has to it. I believe we are here to legislate for the people, and are answerable to the people. I think we can take care of ourselves upon this proposition without any hindrance or intimidation from the Secretary of the Interior. His duty is to execute the law—ours is to enact the law. Let us keep our functions separate and apart, and thereby the people will be better satisfied—our institutions and our Government will be more secure, and better results will be reached. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAFFERTY) there were—ayes 14, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding after the word "shown," in line 19, page 2, the following:

"Provided, That when the person making entry dies before the offer of final proof those succeeding to the entry must show that the entryman had complied with the law in all respects to the date of his death and that they have since complied with the law in all respects, as would have been required of the entryman had he lived, excepting that they are relieved from any requirement of residence upon the land."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk wil report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "actually changed his residence after establishing the same," and insert in lieu thereof the words "failed to establish residence within six months after the date of entry."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire from some gentleman who can answer it the exact reason for inserting those words?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, those words are inserted in order to make clear what has been the interpretation of the homestead law—that an entryman had six months after making his entry within which to establish his home upon the land—and the words which are stricken out may or may not have been used as the foundation for that ruling. The meaning of those words is not entirely clear in the present law, and so the words "actually changed his residence after establishing the same" are stricken out and the words "failed to establish residence within six months after the date of entry" are inserted, so as to make the law clear and definite.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, another point my attention is directed to is this: As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] well knows, the law as now applied and in force permits the entryman to make settlement upon his land within six months after the date of entry. However, if circumstances of a certain nature exist that legitimately excuse him from making that entry, he can upon application receive an extension of an additional six months. Does not this new wording entirely remove that opportunity which he has for making application and getting the additional six months?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all, because the provision to which the gentleman refers is another provision, a proviso to this section, and in the Senate, through inadvertence, evidently, that proviso was left out and should be inserted in the bill in conference. I refer to the proviso that clearly gives the Secretary of the Interior the right to extend the time. This should be the general rule.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is that the law at the present time?

Mr. MONDELL. There is a proviso at the end of this section which was left out, I think, through inadvertence.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is, in the Senate bill?

Mr. MONDELL. In the Senate bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] made the statement that under existing law an entryman had six months within which to begin residence upon his land. The law does not give him that, but the effect of the law is to give an entryman six months, because the entry is not subject to contest until it has been abandoned for more than six months.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in the law now that is definite, but this is definite.

Mr. MILLER. But by construction of the department the entryman is and always has been allowed six months.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but now that we are reenacting the law, it is better to have it clear.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is nothing in the law at present that permits an extension to be granted for six months if he fails to go upon his land. In other words, if he has not first established a residence thereon.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a proviso at the end of this section in the statute.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That if the homesteader fails to begin residence upon his land within six months he may apply for an extension and have six months more within which to go upon the land?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. When was that law enacted?

Mr. MONDELL. Quite a number of years ago. If the gentleman will refer to the Revised Statutes he will find that there is such a law. It is not quite broad enough. It provides that if unable to get on the land for climatic reasons he may make such application and have it granted. The gentleman will recall that he had a case in South Dakota a few days ago where it was suggested that that be amended by adding another reason, to wit, sickness. It is my opinion that when we readopt that provision in conference we ought to add that reason to the present law which gives the Secretary that power.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman please read the section of the statute which has that proviso? There is no such law, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that, under the law, after an entryman has established a residence he may then apply for a leave of absence, but there is no law by which an entryman who fails to go upon his land from any cause, sickness, accident, or any other circumstances, may be granted additional time. He is absolutely at the mercy of anyone who may desire to file a contest against his entry.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say to the gentleman that I know that he is generally right upon matters of land legislation. The proviso to which I referred is not in this copy of the Revised Statutes, but it is in the law and I have read it within the last 24 hours.

Mr. RAKER. I have it here; let me read it:

Provided, That where there may be climatic reasons the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What section?

Mr. RAKER. Twenty-two hundred and ninety-seven, under date of March 1, 1881.

Mr. MONDELL. It is just what I told the gentleman it was; it is a proviso at the end of this section not printed in this statute.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is no such law. The gentleman is reading from a pamphlet, and we have the Revised Statutes here, and I challenge any gentleman to produce the statutes and show me that an extension of six months may be obtained when the entryman fails within six months to establish residence.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest this, that in any event that provision, or some similar provision, should go into the bill in conference.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Minnesota has the time.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to ask if it is not a fact that the law which the gentleman from California read applies solely to climatic conditions, but if a man was sick or had any other thing the matter with him and was not able to get on the land there is not a single line of law that gives the commissioner or the Secretary the authority to give six months more.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is entirely correct; the law is very plain and simple.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a feature of the law which should be corrected.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a further question, and the gentleman from Wyoming can probably answer it. [Laughter.] Under the language, as suggested by the committee, I would like to ask the gentleman if the entry might not be subject to contest where the entryman failed to establish residence in the first six months and did not get upon his land within seven or eight months and before contest had been filed, and the question is whether or not the entry might not be forfeited by a contest being filed subsequent.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows the answer to the riddle himself as well as anyone on the floor. The general rule of construction is that when the entryman settles upon the land in the absence of an intervening claim no laches that has occurred prior to that time can be invoked against him; therefore, without regard to this provision, when the entryman goes upon the homestead before any contest is filed his right attaches. The gentleman knows that has been decided a great many times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I would like to say one or two things in reference to this provision. My inquiry was not simply one of curiosity, but based on some experience. We have two classes of public lands, if I may use that term, in this country, one class consisting of lands located in sections wherein the climatic conditions are not very severe and another class located wherein the climatic conditions are very severe. Those lands that still form a part of the public domain in the Northwest are of this latter class. By Northwest, I refer to public lands in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan. The only part of the public domain now remaining is in that wooded portion far to the north, where the climatic conditions are very, very severe. It was not many years ago that a large number of very honest homesteaders who had made proper application and tried to get upon the land within six months could not do so by reason of the floods. They absolutely could not get into the region.

Last fall there was an opening of lands on several Indian reservations, and all the entrymen, of course, had to take land subject to the homestead laws. That opening occurred late in the fall, and there followed conditions quite unprecedented. Early in November winter started in full force and continued almost without interruption until the present time. No man who had made entry could go upon the land and live there. I made application to the Secretary of the Interior to see if there was not some way in which an extension could be granted these honest entrymen. He replied by quoting this section, whereupon application was made, and I have no doubt they will receive a suitable extension. It seems to me that the language of this section absolutely precludes the possibility of any entryman securing an extension of six months due to climatic or any other conditions. A possible extension under certain conditions is a most salutary provision of the law. It should by all means be retained as a part of the law regulating homestead entry. By oversight, I have no doubt, this paragraph has been framed in such a way as to take away the right to an extension, and I think we ought to change the paragraph.

In addition, the paragraph as worded precludes any man who goes upon his land after six months and before contest is filed from perfecting his claim. There have been thousands and tens of thousands of cases where men have failed to get upon their land within six months, but who have established residences there prior to contest and become the very best of homesteaders. This paragraph would annihilate them.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman offer as an amendment to this section the provision which the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] read, with a slight change, by using the words "from climatic conditions" as an additional proviso?

Mr. MILLER. I am very thankful to the gentleman from Illinois for his suggestion. I had an amendment in mind, and will offer it now. I do not believe we ought to wait to do this in conference. We ought to frame the law as it should be here.

Mr. MANN. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the proviso that is in the bill in this section No. 2297. It really relates to the loss of the rights of the entrymen, and is not the section under which he acquires rights. Now, you say in this section:

That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land.

In the other section, No. 2291, you provide that a patent shall issue at the end of three years from the date of entry, if they make application for it. The two sections, it seems to me, are contradictory.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MANN. Yes; if you can answer the puzzle. I do not ask to have it changed here now, but I call attention to that fact. In one place it says, in three years from the date of entry a patent shall issue, and in the other place it says that the three years shall date from the date of the residence upon the land, which, in the terms of the bill, may be six months after the entry, and if the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] prevails, one year after the period of the entry.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no conflict at all.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Wyoming——

Mr. MONDELL. I think I can prove it to the gentleman, if he will give me a moment.

Mr. MANN. I will in a moment, but the gentleman has had more moments than I. My friend from Wyoming is so familiar with the land laws that he tosses one section up in the air with one hand and one section with the other hand, and when they come down nobody can tell whether the one that went up from one hand comes down in the other hand, or vice versa. I have carefully examined these two sections and I know there is a conflict. Now, the gentleman can prove to me, if he can, that there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. I think if the gentleman will watch the juggler, the sleight-of-hand performance will be so simple that he will understand it. There is absolutely no conflict.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Section 2291 provides that the entryman shall live for three years on his land, with certain absences. The section just read gives the entryman six months within which to get on his land. Unless you have this proviso the department would have to rule that the first six months during which he shall be allowed absence shall count as residence, going back to the old rule that the department overturned by a decision last fall, because we now make it clear in this very section that the entryman need not go upon his land for six months after he files. We also make it clear that his time does not begin to run until he actually goes on the land. We also make it clear that he can not use his five months' absence at the beginning of his entry; that he has got to get on the land and begin to live on it before he is entitled to any absence or any allowance for residence. And as this section is the section in which we allow him six months to get upon his land, it is the proper section in which to say that the period of residence shall not begin to run until he does get on the land.

Now, I think that the gentleman from Illinois can understand that. I think it is very plain and very simple. We are by this provision writing into the law what is the decision of the Land Office. We did not approve of it at the time it was made, and would not approve of it now if we were to continue a five-year residence, but as we are reducing the residence to three years the committee thought the entryman should not be allowed the six months' constructive residence that has heretofore been the rule.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Why should we not give the man six months in which to establish his residence——

Mr. MONDELL. We do.

Mr. LAFFERTY (continuing). And then let him put in the following six months on the claim, and then count that as one year of the three years required, as they do in Canada?

Mr. MONDELL. The committee did not think it was good policy. They thought if we are to reduce the time to three years, and to give certain definite periods of absence, that it should be clear that the entryman did not begin to earn his patent until he had gotten upon the land and had established his residence.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. RAKER. This provision on page 3, lines 13 to 16, reads as follows:

Provided, That the three years' period of residence herein fixed shall date from the time of establishing actual permanent residence upon the land.

In other words, that if the man makes his filing in the land office, and he waits until six months or within one day of until he makes his permanent residence upon the place, then there must be three years——

Mr. MONDELL. After that date?

Mr. RAKER. After that date, before a certificate of purchase can issue.

Mr. MONDELL. That is correct.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, if the amendment suggested by the gentleman here to give him further time for sickness, or climatic conditions should intervene or interfere, then if he is given six months under the law and another five months because of sickness, his three years of residence must commence after the 11 months have expired.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the confusion which my distinguished friend from Wyoming and my distinguished friend from California fall into comes about because they consider this is all one section on a bill. But this is to amend two separate sections of the Revised Statutes—one to amend section 2291 and one to amend section 2297. Section 2297 does not relate at all to the granting of a patent to the land or to the right which the entryman acquires. It relates only to his proving his right, and refers to the expiration of three years, and then provides the time of residence hereafter fixed. That is in section 2297. That is the method of losing residence.

Now, the other section is the section under which he acquires title, and what does it say? Until the expiration of three years from the date of the entry he is not entitled to his patent, and under the other provision of the law he does not need to live on the land for five months in the year, and if at the end of the fifth month he enters upon the land and lives the balance of the seven months of the year on that land at the end of three years he is entitled to the patent, regardless of the provisions in the other section.

Now, if it is the intention to have the three years run from the date of the residence on the land that provision ought to be to amend that section of the statute.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the gentleman is right about that. A proviso on section 2297 does not limit section 2291. To offer the same proviso after section 2291 would bring about the desired result, and there would be no question about it.

Mr. MANN. There would be no question about it. Otherwise there would be a conflict.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the change, but it is not at all necessary, and every man who knows anything about the homestead laws knows that there are some 10 or 12 sections; that they all contain some provisions and requirements; and they are all construed together. There is no objection to putting this in the other section, but it belongs here just as much as it does in the other place.

Mr. MANN. Put it in both places, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, let us finish the other committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. We are through with committee amendments on this paragraph.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman to wait a moment. I want to offer some amendments in addition to the committee amendments.

Mr. MILLER. I will offer this one. I do not think it will interfere with those of the gentleman from Colorado. I move to amend page 3, line 16, after the word "land," by removing the period and inserting the following:

And provided further, That where there may be climatic reasons, sickness of the entryman, or other unavoidable causes the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The amendment I desire to offer is to strike out, beginning on page 3, line 13, three lines. I conceive that my amendment should be offered first, because otherwise this amendment would not fit in properly. I think an amendment to strike out any part of the paragraph should come before an amendment to follow the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Oregon that the Chair has not the amendment of the gentleman before him, so that he can not tell anything about it. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will be kind enough to send his amendment to the Clerk's desk and have it read, the Chair can judge concerning it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. While you are waiting for the other amendment I will offer this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk. Is the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] ready with his amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I send it to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "land," in line 16, the following: "And provided further, That where there may be climatic reasons, sickness of the entryman, or other unavoidable causes, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, allow the settler 12 months from the date of filing in which to commence his residence on said land, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to that amendment. I move to insert the word "poverty" after the word "sickness."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] offer an amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know with what degree of seriousness my colleague offers that amendment, but in any event that will open the door so wide as to endanger the passage of this bill. I do not think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman offered his amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. I understood he offered an amendment to insert the word "poverty" after the word "sickness."

Mr. MORGAN. After the word "sickness," yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding after the word "sickness" the word "poverty."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman should think this amendment is not a proper one. Mr. Chairman, on broad, general principles we ought to grant this privilege to the man who can not get on his land in six months on account of poverty. I do not know what better excuse a man could have for not getting on his land than that he has not the money necessary to get there; and, so far as I am concerned, we should try to help the poor man above all others

In disposing of the public domain we should place it within reach of the poor man if possible. I am surprised that there should be a single objection to the amendment which I offered.

In the present law there is a provision giving the commissioner authority to grant leaves of absence to those who can not maintain residence, on account of failure of crops, sickness, or other casualty. Why not recognize poverty as a valid excuse for failure to establish residence within six months? Give the poor man a chance; we will injure no one. We will help those who need assistance most, and the Government will lose nothing. I hope all objection will be withdrawn and that the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], to add the provision that the affidavit supporting this application for an extension of time may be made in any State of the Union before any officer authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. MILLER. Is not that the law now?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send his amendment to the Clerk's desk so that it may be reported?

Mr. MORGAN. My amendment is not in writing, but I will prepare it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. While the gentleman is preparing his amendment, would it be in order to offer two or three small amendments to the form of the bill?

Mr. MANN. We can not wait for a Member to prepare amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I will have this ready in just a moment. I believe it is important.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. MILLER was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in after the word "by," in line 3, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "by," insert the words "himself and by."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 4, page 2, after the word "have," by inserting the word "actual."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 4, page 2, by inserting after the word "have" the word "actual."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 4, page 2, by striking out the word "or" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the word "or" and inserting the word "and."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Those are all the amendments offered by the committee to this section.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, the United States Government was second to none in the world in its liberal treatment of the settler on its public domain for many years. While we had millions of acres of the richest and best land to dispose of, it made it very easy to acquire homesteads, preemptions, and timber claims, also to secure land under the stone and timber act. All constructions of law and rulings seemed to be made, then, with a view to helping the man to acquire title from the Government. This policy was pursued for so long and so liberally it was inevitable that some abuses should arise. But as the public domain diminished and strife for land became more acute, these abuses became more and more apparent and the courts and the department, especially the latter, became more strict in their interpretation and the execution of the laws, with the result that they have swung to the other extreme and are making life hard indeed for the men who are trying to carve homes from our mountain fastnesses, from our semiarid plains, and from the ragtag and fag ends of our once seemingly inexhaustible domain.

Those settlers who, from virtue of the class of land they are compelled to homestead, should be treated with the greatest liberality are treated with czar-like severity; and by espionage by special agents, and persecution, are often prevented from securing homes for themselves and families, as they are absolutely prohibited from leaving the place they call home long enough to earn enough to keep soul and body together while trying to improve and make possible a livelihood from the land.

It was all right when the land was all good to exact five years of actual residence, as the land was usually adequate to take care of the homesteader and improvements during the time. With the character of land left it is almost a necessity, if a man is not full-handed when he goes on the land, that he have some outside help to make available the possibilities of the land. If he can acquire title in three years, he will have enough improvements on the place to use the improvements and land for security for assistance to make better improvements, to buy stock for grazing, and other purposes.

Conditions are such now that the most liberal policy should be adopted instead of, as practiced now, the most drastic in the history of our Government.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this bill may pass.

A general revision of the land laws is needed, with a view to aiding rather than obstructing the settler in his efforts to establish his rights and for the removal of conditions which constantly harass him in his struggle to build a home for himself and family.

As an evidence of conditions which should not be permitted to exist I am constantly in receipt of letters like the following:

Hon. WILLIAM L. LA FOLLETTE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are tormented here with what the people call hobo wildcat miners. They have prospected over this country for mineral for the last 13 years and have never developed a paying mine yet. At present there is not a mine running in the country. However, there are very few of the homesteaders who have not proven up on their ranches but what these hobo miners are giving them lots of trouble. They (the miners) want to sell out to the ranchers, or they will contest their homesteads and delay their patents for two or three years. Our United States land commissioner here is holding some of those worthless claims on my homestead, and he notified me not to fence or improve it in any way. I would like to ask you if he has any right to hold such claims while he is holding that office; also if there is any way to put a damper on this hobo mining business. Thanking you in advance, I remain, Yours, truly, J. H. SMITH.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEFLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 17671) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

H. R. 14918. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17681. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 2, on page 3, the following:
"No entry for a homestead, or patent issued on the same, shall convey any right to salt, coal, petroleum, natural gas, gold, silver, copper, iron, or other minerals within or under the land covered by the patent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely in sympathy with the proposition to make it easier for the honest homesteader to acquire agricultural lands, but I believe the time has come when we ought to reserve to this Government all mineral lands, especially with reference to homesteads. We ought to do it for two reasons.

If this amendment is adopted, there is very much less danger that the homestead laws will be abused for the purpose of getting homesteads under the guise of seeking a farm, when, instead, it is for some ulterior purpose.

Secondly, from the reports of the Stanley committee and other committees we have seen that one of the gravest evils confronting us to-day is the monopoly of natural resources, especially minerals in this country.

If this Government had maintained a policy from the beginning, as it did originally adopt it in 1785, of reserving to itself the control of the mineral rights in the public domain, we would have had no such thing as a monopoly in minerals to-day; and from the standpoint of revenue we would not be inquiring in which direction to turn in order to secure revenue sufficient to run the Government from year to year.

For instance, the grant to the State of Minnesota of a very small portion of the public domain a great many years ago has been so wisely handled by that State that from royalties they have to-day in their school fund $21,000,000, and from the iron-ore leases alone their revenue this year is over $119,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who can ask that in the agricultural homestead this Government ought to part with its mineral rights, with the mineral that may underlie that land. It ought to belong to the Government for the use of the Government. We have recognized it in the last five or six years so far as coal lands are concerned, and we are separating and classifying them. But if every patent to a homestead should reserve the mineral in the Government it would open up vast fields for homesteaders that are desirous of obtaining them and enable settlers in the far West to go on with agriculture.

Now, much has been said with reference to this bill now pending being in accord with the Canadian law. I want to say that this amendment I have offered is in the identical words of the Canadian law. Whoever says that the Canadian law is a law that we should follow ought to be willing to adopt this amendment here and now. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment will not be adopted. A homestead settler when he goes upon his land makes affidavit that the land is not mineral in character. For the entire period during which he lives on the land the mineral character of the land can be developed by anyone. When he makes his final proof he must prove by two witnesses that the land does not contain any mineral. During all that time the Federal agents are going about over the country to see that the mineral lands are not entered under the agricultural-land law.

But after the entryman makes his final proof and before he receives his patent, which is from one to two years, the question of the mineral character of the land can be raised, and for six years after the patent is issued the question of the mineral character of the land can be raised, providing it is proven that the entryman had any knowledge of the existence of minerals. I have never heard anyone that claimed that any considerable amount of mineral land had passed from the hands of the Government under the homestead law.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. If that is true, what is the gentleman's objection to it?

Mr. MONDELL. My objection is that all the patents that have ever been written by the Government of the United States, in the gentleman's State, in all the States, all the patents that your people hold, are patents from the dome of heaven to the center of the earth, and all patents should be so, if it is possible to have them so and do justice. We do not allow the homesteader to take mineral land at all; we dispose of those lands under another law. But if it should happen that here and there some farmer, 50 or 60 or 100 years after he secures the patent from the Government, should find a little mineral on his land, who is going to be hurt by it? The Canadian law is a monarchial law, the law of England, carrying out the idea that the mineral belongs to the sovereign. It is un-American, and it has no place in the legislation of this Republic.

Mr. LENROOT. Who does it belong to?

Mr. MONDELL. The mineral belongs to the man who holds the title, if it shall be discovered long after the patent was issued. The Government has from 4 to 10 years within which to raise the question of the nonmineral character of the land. I want to suggest to the gentleman that his amendment would not allow the entry of mineral land. It would simply reserve all the mineral that might be in the land that had been proven to be nonmineral. It is not in accordance with the established custom of the country. Our people came here to get away from the monarchical idea that the mineral belonged to the crown; that a few grains of minerals found here or there in private property should be turned over to the Central Government. We do not pass mineral lands under the homestead laws, but if by any possibility a little mineral should be discovered long after the homesteader has received his patent who is injured thereby?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Vote! vote!

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall start what I have to say by suggesting to the gentleman from Oregon, who, when I rose to take the floor, began to cry "vote," that after we are endeavoring to liberalize the laws for gentlemen from western States, like the State he represents, it comes with very poor grace to cry "Vote! vote!"

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to make one observation in reply, since he has criticized me in that manner?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly; proceed.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to say that the people of Oregon are not demanding this law any more than the people of the gentleman's State are demanding it. Letters are coming to me from every part of the Union.

Mr. PICKETT. I am not yielding for a speech. If the gentleman desires to make an observation, make it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. My observation is that when you give a man a home under the homestead law, he should not rest under the constant fear that somebody, some agent of the Government, is going to take it away from him upon the ground that a few grains of mineral are under the soil.

Mr. PICKETT. I am not making any reference to that. I am speaking of the propriety of the gentleman, after having the floor for 30 minutes——

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman from Iowa could have had the floor if he had asked it.

Mr. PICKETT (continuing). Immediately begins to cry "Vote!" when a member of the committee who has not had the floor rises to speak.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] seems to me to be a good one. When my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggested that it was adopting a monarchical custom prevailing in other countries, he overlooked the fact that this whole law purports to be patterned after the Canadian law; and if that is true, as was suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], why not also embody the reservations and the limitations that are in the Canadian law for the benefit of the people? While it may be true that the minerals in the monarchical system, as the gentleman from Wyoming suggests, are reserved to the Crown, it should be true in this country that they should be reserved to the sovereign—that is to say, to the people. That is all that the amendment is purposed for.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PICKETT. With pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. Is there any such reservation in the good old State of Iowa?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not know that there is.

Mr. MONDELL. There is not.

Mr. PICKETT. I suppose there is not.

Mr. MANN. The people would be better off if there had been.

Mr. PICKETT. But, assuming that to be true, the fact that we have pursued an erroneous policy in the past is no justification for continuing it in the future. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in conformity with the suggestions which come from the Secretary of the Interior, and, while that may not carry weight with some Members of this House, I think it is entitled to be considered and is entitled to weight. I do not desire to discuss the matter further than to observe that, in my judgment the amendment is a good one; and, at least, if the amendment is adopted by the House, it can go to conference and there be considered with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make this one observation, and I do not believe that I should take more than a minute. The policy suggested by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] inaugurates a new scheme, and it is quite probable and does, I think, in fact classify every acre of land in the United States which belongs to the public domain as mineral land. Whether it is wise to do that or unwise to do that, we ought not to inject it into this debate and into consideration of this bill, where we are proposing simply to change the time required in proving up a homestead from five years to three years. I hope the committee who have heard this debate and have not had time to consider this policy will let the proposition wait, whether it be wise or unwise, until some time when we can consider it upon its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado) there were—ayes 30, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine Members are present——

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point.

Mr. MANN. I move that the committee do now rise. The gentleman can not withdraw after the Chair has announced there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 3367, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3367, the bill which was under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3367, with Mr. FOSTER of Illinois in the chair.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 3, line 13, beginning with the word "provided," strike out all from the word "provided" down to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of line 13, after the word "Government," and the three succeeding lines.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, now I want to call the attention of the committee to one thing. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was correct when he said that this proviso is in direct conflict with the first section of this bill. The first section says after three years a man can get his patent. A further provision says that he can have six months in which to go upon the land. Then this proviso I seek to strike out says that he can not get his patent until three years, or can not prove up for three years, after he made actual residence. Therefore the proviso I seek to strike out makes this not a three-year homestead, but it makes it a three-and-a-half-year homestead. If we are going to put in any of these provisions of the Canadian law, this certainly ought to be done.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 2297 as amended, the following:
"No entry for a homestead or patent issued on the same shall convey any exclusive or other property or interest in or any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any lake, river, spring, stream, or other body of water within or bordering on or passing through the land covered by the entry."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and is also in the words of the Canadian law which has been so strongly approved by gentlemen favoring this bill this afternoon; and I want to say to the gentlemen from these western land States that if they are entirely and wholly in good faith now they will vote for this amendment, because those gentlemen well know that many thousands of acres of land are now withdrawn, and properly withdrawn, because of water-power sites located upon some portion of them. If this amendment is adopted, reserving to the Government the right, so far as the power site is concerned, every acre of those withdrawn lands can be thrown open to settlement under homestead without injury to the Government and at the same time doing much to settle the agricultural possibilities of the western country. I am anxious to see what gentlemen are going to say in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. MANN. May I ask unanimous consent on agreeing to close debate on this, because we can not stay here much longer. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will take only a minute or two to say that my objection to the gentleman's amendment is that I do not consider this the time or place or that this is a measure on which to engraft such legislation as this.

Mr. Chairman, we can not put into this bill, which merely seeks to shorten the time of residence on the homestead from five to three years, all the reforms and amendments which ought to go into the land laws of this country. I would like to put an amendment into this law that I consider very much more beneficial to the settlers upon the public domain than the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and that is this: I would like to reduce the number of acres required to be cultivated under the enlarged homestead act from 80 to 40. In my experience that is the greatest burden and hardship under the enlarged homestead act that is imposed on the settlers on the public domain. It has been the greatest source of complaint of which I have heard.

I think it is an illogical and absurd requirement to make settlers plow 80 acres of land every year. We give a settler 320 acres of land because he can not make a living on 160 acres. He can not make a living on 160 acres because he can not raise crops on any part of it, and yet we turn right around and make him break his back year after year by plowing 80 acres of his 320 acres, wasting all his substance on it, dissipating his efforts over that great area without beneficial results, and absolutely destroying it for purposes of pasturage. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to relieve them of that burden, but I do not propose to undertake it in this bill, and that is the objection I have to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have one other and last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 16, on page 3, add the following:
"If any entry is made for land which, though not reserved at the time, is ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior to be chiefly valuable on account of merchantable timber upon it the entry may be canceled within six months of its date."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to this amendment. This is another of the amendments recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, but I want to frankly say it is unlike the Canadian law. The Canadian law, which has been spoken of so often this afternoon, provides that if there be any timber of value upon an entry the minister may cancel the entry. My amendment provides that if it shall be ascertained that land is chiefly valuable because of the timber upon it, then the entry may be canceled within six months; and, Mr. Chairman, I heard no reply with reference to the amendment I offered a moment ago. I am wondering now whether our friends in the western land States desire this homestead shortening of the time for the purpose of enabling the men to get large tracts of timber to sell to the Timber Trust, or do they desire it for the purpose of the homesteader who desires to make for himself a home and a farm. If that is the desire, I am in the fullest sympathy with that.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that under the present law and rulings of the department a man can not get the land designated by the gentleman when it is chiefly valuable for timber?

Mr. LENROOT. I think not.

Mr. RAKER. There is not any decision to the contrary.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is classified as open to homestead entry——

Mr. RAKER. And the gentleman would not object, would he, supposing there were 160 acres of land, 140 of it being agricultural land and 20 of it being timberland, that the 20 acres of timber should be left to the man who made the entry?

Mr. LENROOT. It would not be chiefly valuable for timber in that event, and my amendment only goes to land that is chiefly valuable for timber.

Mr. MANN. If that is existing law, what is the objection to putting it in here?

Mr. LENROOT. What is the objection to putting it in here?

Mr. RAKER. There are bills pending before the committee upon these different subjects, and why should we burden this bill simply because of the question of limitation and other questions?

Mr. LENROOT. If I thought for a moment there was an opportunity to be presented at this session of Congress to offer this as an amendment to some other bill, I would not have offered the amendment here now; but I do not believe, nor does the gentleman from California believe, that we will have another opportunity to do this at this session of Congress.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that every effort is being made to bring such bills in here.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope they may be, but I do not believe they will.

And, Mr. Chairman, just one other suggestion—that when we are shortening the time for these homesteaders from five years to three years, it is not unreasonable that we should put into the law these various amendments that I have offered. It does not hurt them; it does not harm them. The theory of the law is that they are going to get homesteads for agricultural purposes and nothing more, and not one amendment that is offered has sought to limit that in the slightest degree.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, can we get an agreement about closing debate? If we can not, I will have to make the point of no quorum. I do not care whether we go ahead or not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been trying all the afternoon to get in, and there are others who want time. I do not desire to shut out any Member who wants to speak.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Let me have two minutes.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire, either, to shut out anyone who wants to speak.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a minute and a half of time. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has thrown out a challenge. This is a very important matter.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate on this amendment close in six minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has not been recognized all afternoon, and there are other gentlemen who wish to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. What request does the gentleman from Illinois make?

Mr. MANN. I will not make any request. But I am not going to stay here until half past 6 o'clock to-night without a quorum. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] thinks they ought to have more time, and I think myself they ought to have more time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, here is a gentleman who has been trying all the afternoon to get an opportunity to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I would have been through before now if I had been allowed to go on.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] tell me of any timber in the United States that can be acquired in large quantities, either by fraudulent entries or any other kind of entries, at the present time. If he will point out where it is, he will confer a great favor upon a great many people who are looking about for just such "snaps." [Laughter.] The truth is that outside of the forest reserves there is very little timberland of value left in the United States, and I protest against our passing any drastic legislation here that will prevent honest settlers from going on our mountain lands that have more or less timber on them and trying there to acquire homes, and which will leave it to the discretion and determination of the Secretary of the Interior in Washington and some of his hired agents who are sent out, who know nothing about the conditions as to whether the land is more desirable for timber or for agricultural purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If, as the gentleman says, there is no such timber left open, then this amendment would not be drastic.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; but lots of men are being made miserable who are trying to acquire homesteads honestly under the land laws of the United States. [Applause.]

I have lived on the frontier for the last 36 years, gentlemen, and I think I know as much about the lands that are left unsettled as anybody in the House, and I am here to tell you that we have not got any very valuable timberlands left. If any settlers can go into the lands that are left unsettled, with some timber on them, and acquire homes, they surely ought to have that privilege. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am sick and tired of hearing gentlemen get up on the floor of this House and roast executive officers of this Government who are sworn to do their duty and who are doing their duty. I want to tell you that when the Secretary of the Interior enforces the law which we put upon the statute books he should have the moral support of every Member of this House. [Applause.] I make the point of no quorum.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no! Withdraw it!

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. No; I will not withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are 95 Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3367) to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the bill to-day have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the bill to-day have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. On this bill.

The SPEAKER. On this bill and no other.

Mr. MANN. For five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. For five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11824. An act to amend section 113 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

SENATE BILLS AND HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate and House bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4144. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Greeley, Colo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 5446. An act relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

H. R. 17681. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADJOURNMENT.

By Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland (by request): Petition of citizens of Carroll County, Md., protesting against extension of the parcel-post system; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. TILSON: Petition of the Hartford Yacht Club, of Hartford, Conn., protesting against passage of House bill 15786; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. WATKINS: Petition of citizens of Natchitoches and Rossier Parishes, La., for parcel-post legislation; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of citizens of Winn Parish, La., for old-age pensions; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE: Petitions of citizens of Rainbow, Stockport, and Caldwell, Ohio, favoring the Sulzer parcel-post bill (H. R. 14); to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WILLIS: Memorial of Rush Creek Grange, Rushsylvania, Ohio, in favor of extension of the parcel post; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WILSON of New York: Petition of members of Improved Order of Red Men of fourth congressional district of New York, for an American Indian memorial and museum building in the city of Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 21, 1912.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. MCCUMBER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER (S. DOC. NO. 450).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate concurrent resolution No. 18, a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army, relative to the work of levee construction in the improvement of the navigability of the Mississippi River, on the east bank thereof from Vicksburg to Bayou Sara, etc., together with a copy of a special report from the acting president of the Mississippi River Commission, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

NAVY RETIRED LIST (S. DOC. NO. 449).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 15th ultimo, a statement showing the number of officers on the retired list of the Navy January 1, 1912, according to grade and rank and amount of yearly compensation paid to such officers of each such grade and rank, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 11824) to amend section 113 of the act to "codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Weirsdale, Fla., and Dayton, Ky., and of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Georgetown, Tex., and the Methodist Church of Thompson, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of members of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo.; of the Chamber of Commerce of Baltimore, Md.; and of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against any reduction being made in the annual appropriation for the maintenance of the Diplomatic and Consular Service, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of members of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to exempt from toll all American ships engaged in coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Highland, De Land, Dongola, Plainfield, and Murphysboro, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the extension of the parcel-post system beyond its present limitations, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 224, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, of La Salle, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of one of the proposed new battleships in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Verona, Ill., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Verona and Reno, Ill., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Belleville and Elizabethtown, in the State of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a parcel-post system, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of 166 citizens, members of the Methodist Church of Sheridan, Wyo., and a petition of 50 citizens, members of the Baptist Church of Sheridan, Wyo., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard bill to withdraw from interstate-commerce protection liquors imported into "dry" territory for illegal use, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW presented memorials of sundry citizens of Dwight, Admire, Lecompton, Junction City, Belleville, Quenomo, Larned, Manchester, Argonia, and Carlton, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the coloring of oleomargarine in imitation of butter, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Wichita, Kans., remonstrating against the establishment of a parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BRIGGS presented a petition of members of the Board of Education of Newark, N. He also presented petitions of members of the Friday Club and the Lutheran Church, of Bridgeton; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Reformed Church, of Asbury Park; of the Plumsted Presbyterian Church, of New Egypt; of sundry citizens of Woodcliff-on-Hudson and Ridgefield Park; of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Almonesson; the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Asbury Park; the Methodist Episcopal Church of Barnegat; the Christian Church of Vienna; the Presbyterian Church of Barnegat; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dumont and Trenton; and of sundry citizens of Newark and Montclair, all in the State of New Jersey; and of the Salt's Textile Manufacturing Co., of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of members of the Deutsch-Amerikanischer Central Verein, of Orange; the German-Irish Alliance of Essex County, Newark; and of the Williamstown Glass Co., of Williamstown, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEYBURN presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 5192) for the relief of W. B. Horn, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives of the General Court of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 8, 1912.

Whereas it is proposed to remove or abolish the United States navy yard in the Charlestown district of the city of Boston; and

Whereas in the opinion of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts such a step would be detrimental to the interests of Charlestown, of the port of Boston, and of the entire Commonwealth: Therefore be it

Ordered, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth be requested to use their best endeavors to prevent such removal or abolishment; and be it further Ordered, That a copy of this order be sent by the clerk of the house of representatives to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

A true copy.

Attest:

JAMES W. KIMBALL,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry employees of the pulp and paper mills of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the placing of wood pulp and print paper on the free list, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Gardner, Mass., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry employees of the N. Ward Co., of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on glue, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WETMORE presented the petition of H. J. Wheeler, director, and other members of the Rhode Island Horticultural Association, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the importation and interstate transportation of nursery stock, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of 100 employees of the American Shear & Knife Co., of Hotchkissville, Conn., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on cutlery, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Southington, Conn., remonstrating against the repeal of the anticanteen law, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Meriden and Brookfield, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions in the nature of a memorial adopted by the Fishermen's Protective Association of Noank, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the use of power boats, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which were referred the following resolutions, reported them severally without amendment:

S. Res. 254. Authorizing the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, or any subcommittee thereof, to conduct hearings, etc., and to sit during the sessions of the Senate;

S. Res. 255. Authorizing the Committee on Public Lands to employ a stenographer, etc.; and

S. Res. 252. Authorizing the Committee on Fisheries to conduct hearings, employ stenographers, etc.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 242, directing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to inquire into and report to the Senate whether post-office inspectors are being sent through the country to influence postmasters to aid in the election of delegates for or against any candidate for the presidency, etc., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 497) thereon.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5676) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to set aside for sanatorium purposes not to exceed four sections of the unallotted tribal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Oklahoma, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 495) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 5141) to correct an error in the record of the supplemental treaty of September 28, 1830, made with the Choctaw Indians, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 494) thereon.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 19863) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to subdivide and extend the deferred payments of settlers in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache ceded lands in Oklahoma, and I submit a report (No. 496) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I object, unless there is some explanation of it.

Mr. OWEN. The bill has already passed the House. It meets the approval of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Adams, whose report accompanies the report of the committee. I thought the Senator from Kansas was informed in regard to it.

Mr. CURTIS. I was not. I was not at the committee meeting when the bill was ordered reported out.

Mr. OWEN. It was ordered reported this morning from the committee before the Senator from Kansas came into the committee, I suppose. They simply have had a drought there for three successive years, and this is only extending the time. It is a matter to which I think there can be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas object?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the calendar.

MANUEL AGÜERO Y JUNQUÉ.

Mr. DU PONT. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Mr. Manuel Agüero y Junqué, of Cuba, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. Manuel Agüero y Junqué, of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Manuel Agüero y Junqué shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Manuel Agüero y Junqué shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board: And provided further, That in the case of the said Manuel Agüero y Junqué the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Delaware how many of these young men from different countries are now in the Military Academy, if he can give the information?

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there are only two young men actually there at the present time, Hernan Arthur Ulloa, of Costa Rica, receiving instructions under the provisions of the joint resolution of Congress approved January 18, 1908, and Demetrio Castillo, jr., of Cuba, receiving instruction under the provisions of an act of Congress approved March 4, 1909. It is true that there has been authority granted to admit three more, but they have not yet reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall the fact, Mr. President, that not long ago such authority was granted for three other young men; I have forgotten from what country they hailed, but it seemed to me we were liable to overdo this thing if we did not call a halt. Can the Senator state where those three are to come from?

Mr. DU PONT. Yes; I will give the Senator full information.

Under the authority of the joint resolution approved January 26, 1912, the one to which the Senator probably refers, José Pasos Diaz, of Nicaragua, son of the president of that country, was permitted to enter the Military Academy for instruction in June next. Authority has also been granted by the joint resolution of Congress approved February 24, 1911, for the admission of two Chinese subjects, to be designated hereafter by the Government of China, to receive instruction at the Military Academy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I called attention to this matter simply by way of suggestion. I think there is some danger of our being a little too liberal in this respect, educating young men who possibly may be troublesome to us in time of war. If we educate the Chinese young men, a nation that is developing very rapidly and that will become a warlike nation in the near future with 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 people, I am not quite sure whether it is good policy. But I, of course, do not object to the consideration of the joint resolution. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the matter; that was all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether or not, in the process of educating at West Point or Annapolis, as the case may be, these student cadets have full access to Government publications containing plans, statements, and statistics that might be used to some advantage against our country. We are quite particular in excluding what we call spies, who come to get such information as we have in regard to our systems of defense. Does a student enrolled at West Point, passing through the ordinary course of education, have access to that kind of information?

Mr. DU PONT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that he has access to no greater sources of military information than are to be found in every public library. All matters of a confidential nature are kept in the War Department or the Navy Department, and no student at West Point, be he American or foreigner, has any access to them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had supposed that was the fact, but I wanted that it should appear in the RECORD in connection with the consideration of this question. As a principle, I am opposed to opening our naval and military schools to the education of possible enemies. But I am not disposed to carry it further than to state my objection. Still, I like to inquire from time to time just how far it goes and the status of the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 5959) granting a pension to E. S. Pease;

A bill (S. 5960) granting an increase of pension to David C. Crawford; and

A bill (S. 5961) granting a pension to Mrs. George O. Richardson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROOT:

A bill (S. 5962) to increase the limit of cost of the addition to the site of the Federal building at Utica, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5963) to amend an act to amend section 6 of the currency act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1907; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 5964) for the relief of estate of J. H. Christian, deceased (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5965) granting a pension to Nancy J. Haskett; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 5966) granting an increase of pension to William Day (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 5967) granting an increase of pension to John T. Allen (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 5968) granting an increase of pension to John W. Shaw;

A bill (S. 5969) granting an increase of pension to Ellen S. Kirkham;

A bill (S. 5970) granting an increase of pension to Frank S. Shaffer; and

A bill (S. 5971) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia M. Hale; to the Committee on Pensions.

JAMES BUTLER AND OTHERS.

Mr. BRIGGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5547) for the relief of James Butler and others, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEER MILITIA.

Mr. BRIGGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5279) extending the benefits of the general pension laws to the organizations comprising the Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia, otherwise known as the "emergency men," which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL (H. R. 21477).

Mr. McLEAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $54,000 for improving West River, Conn., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $11,000 for improving Stockton Harbor, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WETMORE submitted an amendment relative to the improvement of Dutch Island Harbor, R. I., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to grant Louis M. Tisdale the right and authority to construct and operate a channel through Mobile Bay, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the extension of the contract with the Ragland Water Power Co. to complete the dam partially built by the United States at Lock No. 4 on the Coosa River, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THE INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that 1,000 additional copies be printed, for the use of the document room, of Senate Document No. 406, being the address by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE, delivered at Princeton University March 8, 1912.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 406, "The Compulsory Initiative and Referendum and the Recall of Judges," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

WITHDRAWALS OF PUBLIC LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 448).

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the speech delivered June 14, 1910, by a very able and distinguished Senator in this Chamber, the late Hon. Charles J. Hughes, jr., of Colorado, on the withdrawals of public lands in certain cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor is entered.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. 5194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

James T. Brown, late of Troop K, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, War with Spain, $12.

John W. Sturm, late of Company K, Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

William A. Hamilton, late of Company F, First Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Thomas McCavan, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and Company B, Fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Archie E. Booth, late of Company D, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Albert F. Reynolds, late of Company C, Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, $16.

Jacob Adams, late of Company H, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, $20.

John Waalkes, late of Company C, Thirty-fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $30.

Harriet J. Bockerman, widow of August Bockerman, late of Troop A, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, $12.

Jacob Korby, late of Company C, Thirty-sixth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $10.

James C. Smith, late of Company M, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Ralph W. Ingard, late of Company B, Second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Harry McFarlin, late second lieutenant Company K, First Regiment Florida Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $24.

Josephine K. Woodson, widow of Albert E. Woodson, late major Ninth Regiment United States Cavalry and brigadier general United States Army, $40.

Vee Aiken, widow of William M. Aiken, late of Troop F, Third Regiment United States Cavalry, $12 per month and $2 per month additional on account of the minor child of said William M. Aiken until he reaches the age of 16 years.

Bert Derendinger, late of Company I, Thirty-first Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $20.

Harry Colpus, late of Hospital Corps, United States Army, War with Spain, $15.

Abner E. Armstrong, late of Capt. Wilber's Company D, First Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Mealchi Baughman, late of Capt. R. L. Williams's Company E, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Hiram R. McCord, late of Capt. W. H. Latshaw's Company A, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Mahlon Petree, late of Capt. W. H. Latshaw's Company A, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Andrew McDonal, late of Company C, Forty-fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $24.

George F. Wallet, late of Company C, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Charles Miller, late of Company I, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, $40.

Jesse Turrentine, late of Company C, First Regiment Alabama Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $20.

William F. Pace, late of Colonel Markham's Nauvoo Legion, Utah Volunteers, Utah Indian war, $16.

Margaret B. Sherman, widow of Francis H. Sherman, late lieutenant commander, United States Navy, and commodore, United States Navy, retired, $40.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 6 I move to strike out, from line 9 to line 13, inclusive, the item relative to Margaret B. Sherman. I desire to state as a reason for striking this out that the item is one taken from a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and he desires that it be taken out because he thinks the committee did not allow as great an amount as should have been allowed in this case, and he wishes it to be again submitted to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6 it is proposed to strike out, from line 9 to line 13, inclusive, as follows:

> The name of Margaret B. Sherman, widow of Francis H. Sherman, late lieutenant commander, United States Navy, and commodore, United States Navy, retired, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, with reference to the Spanish-American War pensions, whether the beneficiaries could have been pensioned under the general law as it now exists, and why special pensions are necessary for them? Nearly all of the pensioners named in this bill are Spanish-American War pensioners, and they classify themselves practically under the same head. Therefore, instead of making any motion to strike out, classifying the Spanish-American War pensions contained in the bill as a whole, I ask that information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know that I fully understood, on account of some disturbance in the Chamber, everything the Senator from Georgia said in his request. I will, however, again reassert what I stated on yesterday, that on account of there being but one pension committee in the Senate and two pension committees in the other House, we divide the bills in such a way so that all of those which would go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the other House shall be in one bill, and all of those which would go to the Committee on Pensions of the other House will be included in another bill. The Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House considers only cases of Civil War veterans, while the other committee considers the veterans of all other wars and what we know as the Regular Establishment. Therefore, in this bill we have those of the Spanish War, some of the Mexican War, and some in the Regular Establishment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, he is putting himself to a little more trouble than I meant to put him to. I only asked, as the large majority of these pensioners are Spanish-American War pensioners, that the chairman of the committee should explain to us whether they are not covered by the general law, and why the committee deemed it essential to give these pensioners special pensions when we have a general law applicable to the Spanish-American War pensions?

Mr. McCUMBER. The same rule would apply in this case, Mr. President, that would apply to special bills in relation to those of the Civil War, except the same degree of increase would not be allowed for two reasons: First, because of the character of the conflict, and second, because of the disparity of the ages between pensioners of the Civil War and those of the Spanish-American War. Wherever we have granted an additional pension to a veteran of the Spanish War over and above what the general law allows him, we have granted it because, as a committee, we have felt that it was a case of that character that demanded a greater amount. For instance, there are quite a number—I do not know whether they are in this bill or not—of those who became sick in the Philippines with some ailment that seemed to affect the mind. Quite a number of soldiers became insane more or less because of the service. Often the amount allowed in such cases is not sufficient. Sometimes the particular ailment can not be attributed absolutely, by the department at least, to service origin. We have been more liberal probably in the matter of determining that a case is of service origin than has been the department. Whenever the exigency of the case—the poverty, the disease, the affliction which affects the soldier—is so great that the committee feel that a greater degree of justice should be given him in the matter of a pension than that which is allowed by the general law, we have universally allowed a greater amount than the general law would allow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are not the majority of these cases those of men who were turned down by the Pension Bureau upon the ground that they could not trace their present disabilities to service origin?

Mr. McCUMBER. In some instances, as I have stated, they are cases which have been turned down, but there are a very few of those. In most instances, I believe, they are cases in which an increase has been given. The Senator will remember that the law which grants a service pension does not apply to veterans of the Spanish War. A disability must absolutely have been incurred in the service to allow them any pension whatever, and, therefore, very often in those cases which come to us we pass upon the question whether or not the injury upon which the claimant asks his pension is of service origin. In some few of these cases we have so found, even though the department may not have found that they were of service origin. The department officials ordinarily do not find negatively that a disability is not of service origin; they are satisfied with the conclusion that the evidence fails to show that it is of service origin. When a committee of the other House, after careful consideration, have found that a disability was of service origin, we go over the papers again, and possibly we may make some allowance for the finding of the committee in the other House and not give the case the same rigid examination that we would if it came to us in the first instance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the committee, then, contemplate the practice of placing on the pension roll by special act of Congress Spanish-American War soldiers who have no disability of service origin, but who for some other cause subsequent to their service have become disabled?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, the committee do not recommend a pension by special act of Congress in favor of a veteran of the Spanish War unless the committee are satisfied that his disability is of service origin.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one more question, Mr. President. Many of these men are young. What provision will there be for stopping their pensions if the men recover their health, and what provision for renewed examination in the cases of men who have stomach trouble or something of that kind? Do they go upon the roll as permanent pensioners?

Mr. McCUMBER. Such pensions as are given them are granted under the provisions and limitations of the pension laws; and under the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws if there is a recovery, and that fact is established, the pension ceases.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there any provision by which these very young men are to be reexamined? Of course, the general pension law was prepared with reference to the aged soldiers of the Civil War, and a man who has reached 70 years of age and who has the disability of old age has practically no prospect for recovery, but in the case of young men of 35 say, the disabilities not consisting of the loss of a limb or a wound would seem in all probability to be disabilities that will pass away in the near future. There is no special provision for renewed examination of these young men, is there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is not necessary. In the first place, the committee will scarcely recommend a special bill unless the evidence is quite conclusive that the disability is one from which there will in all probability be no recovery. If it is uncertain, if it appears there is a reasonable chance for recovery, the bill is laid aside and is not acted upon at all by the committee. The Pension Bureau is paying out altogether something in the neighborhood of $700,000, I think, a year for special agents and examiners, who are constantly looking up cases where there has been a recovery, whether of a Spanish-American War veteran or otherwise. Where a pension has been allowed and a special agent ascertains the fact that the soldier has recovered, or if it is brought to the attention of the bureau in any other manner that some person is drawing a pension for a disability from which he has recovered, he will be given notice of the finding of the department and be allowed a hearing. The department will then determine whether his pension should be discontinued. Here is one case, for instance, right in this same bill where a veteran was dropped from the pension roll, I presume upon a report of one of the special examiners, and possibly with very little opportunity to be heard, or at least the hearing granted was not such that he was able to make the showing that was made before the committee in the House. He is reinstated by one of the items in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As to the some 28,000 Spanish-American War veterans who are now on the pension roll—there is something like that number, I believe—ought there not to be a provision as to these very young men, nearly all of whom are under 40, that at least annually they should file in the Pension Office a certificate of a physician that they still are subject to the disability?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that would be rather a difficult matter. If a man had his arm shot off, for instance, I would hardly think it quite proper that he should report every year that the arm was still off; or, if he lost a leg that he should do the same thing. Many disabilities are necessarily continuing, and I do not know how the law would proceed to distinguish between those which are naturally continuing and those which by any possibility may cease to exist.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator had listened to what I stated, he would have understood that I expressly excepted those who were suffering from wounds. I mentioned that in my first question to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, if a man had his leg shot off he would be suffering from a wound.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I expressly limited my question to those who were suffering from diseases, such as stomach trouble and diseases other than the loss of members, or wounds that would be continuous; and, so far as I can recall, in this bill there is not the case, or, if so, very few, of men who suffer from wounds. If the Senator will allow me to state just this further, his illustration of the wound was the very thing I had excepted, and his answer is in no sense an answer to the question I asked.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5415) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

It proposes to pension the persons named at the rates per month stated:

Samuel C. Whitwam, late of Company F, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, $50.

Leander O. Tucker, late of Company K, Thirty-third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill by striking out all of lines 8 to 11, inclusive, on page 11, the case of David P. Sheibley, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 5, I move to strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, strike out lines 7 to 10 of the bill, as follows:

The name of Henry C. Jones, late of Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire the Clerk to read the report of the committee upon this case, and also the report of the committee upon the case of Nathan T. Kimball, which is No. 1974. When he shall have finished reading those extracts I shall still desire to occupy the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY (reading from page 10, Senate Report No. 184):

S. 543. Henry C. Jones was a private in Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry. He enlisted March 6, 1865, and was honorably discharged August 11, 1865, having served over five months. He is a pensioner under the service act of February 6, 1907, at the rate of $12 per month. He was formerly pensioned at the same rate under the act of June 27, 1890, but after the passage of the age pension law elected to take pension thereunder. He also filed a claim under the general law December 10, 1889, alleging that he contracted rheumatism in the Army, but the claim was rejected, and properly so, for the reason that he could not furnish the necessary evidence to prove service origin and continuance of his disability.

The claimant is over 67 years of age. When last examined, August 9, 1899, he was rated $6 for rheumatism and $17 for loss of right eye incurred in accident since the war. Medical evidence submitted to this committee is to the effect that claimant is so disabled from loss of right eye and rheumatism that he is unable to perform any kind of labor. It is also shown that he is poor and without property or means of support other than his pension. On account of soldier's age, poverty, and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, the committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month; his service was comparatively short, hence no greater increase is warranted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator indicate the other?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Bill No. 1974, page 21.

The Secretary read from Senate Report No. 384, as follows:

S. 1974. Nathan T. Kimball, of Boise, Idaho, is shown by the records of the War Department to have enlisted September 14, 1861, as a private in Company G, Eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and to have been honorably discharged July 17, 1865. He filed and established a claim under the act of June 27, 1890, and is now pensioned under said act at $12 per month for wound of left shoulder. He filed a claim under the general law September 22, 1891, alleging that he received gunshot wound of left shoulder in the battle of Gettysburg and gunshot wound of right leg in the battle of Beverly Ford, Va. There is no record evidence of his being wounded in the Army, and he has filed no proof of service incurred and has long since abandoned the claim.

The claimant is now 66 years of age. He has not been examined by bureau surgeons since February, 1892, but as far back as that date he was reported to be almost totally disabled for manual labor by reason of wound of left shoulder. Medical evidence filed with this committee is to the effect that claimant has enlarged prostate gland, causing frequent urination; that he had a stroke of apoplexy in August, 1910, from which he has not completely recovered; that he has old gunshot wound of left shoulder, the use of shoulder being very much restricted; and that his disabilities in connection with his advanced age totally incapacitate him for the performance of manual labor. Neighbors testify that claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and that he has no property and no income except his pension. On account of soldier's age, poverty, and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, the committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask whether there is on file with the clerks any statements, affidavits, or evidence of any kind in connection with the case of Henry C. Jones. If there is, I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary advises the Chair that they have nothing upon the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything that has been presented to the committee in the case of Henry C. Jones indicating any special service in the Army, or that he actually reached the front during his enlistment, because I do not wish to do him an injustice in the view I am going to present, and I only desire to know before I proceed to present the view whether I am right in the supposition that there is nothing in the record peculiar to him with reference to his service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not recall, of course, what the record shows in each instance, even though I may have read the evidence in the particular case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The report does not indicate anything of the sort.

Mr. McCUMBER. The report does not purport to give the evidence in the cases. The reports generally give only a general statement. It would be impossible to include all the evidence. If we did, no one would ever attempt to read it, because the evidence in all the cases that would be reported in this single bill would probably make a very large volume in itself. The many affidavits, doctors' certificates, and other matters of that kind have gone back in all these cases to the Interior Department and the War Department. As to what Mr. Jones's service was, enlisting so late, whether he was at the front at that time or whether he was guarding prisoners in the rear, I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, so far as the record presented to the Senate goes, Mr. Jones enlisted March 6 and actual fighting, except a little battle in North Carolina, was practically over in 30 days. In the natural course of events he never reached the front. In the natural course of events he was scarcely more than on dress parade, safely out of any danger.

I am taking these two cases in the reports to illustrate the view which I have been seeking to press throughout my entire objection to these special pensions. It is this: There is necessarily a limit to what the Government can appropriate for pensions. The Government must necessarily consider the various taxes that will be placed upon the Treasury and must determine what amount can be appropriated to pensions. I am criticizing the mode of distribution. I am seeking to press the view that the amounts paid to men who were not actually in the service ought not to exceed $12 a month, and that the men who really did the fighting ought to have a better proportion of the $150,000,000 a year which the Government appropriates for the pensioners of the Civil War. That has been the line of thought that I have been seeking to press in my entire criticism of the special pension bills so far as they apply to pensioners of the Civil War.

The two special pensions that I have called attention to—the one with a motion to strike out and the other without a motion to strike out—illustrate what I have had in view. Mr. Jones enlisted March 6, 1865. Mr. Kimball enlisted September 14, 1861. One went through the war, in battle after battle, enduring the hardships of real war. He was wounded in the service. He was in the service from September 14, 1861, to July 17, 1865. He was wounded in his left shoulder. They are equally broken down now in old age. The special pension bill before us gives them the same sum of money, $24 each. The one who probably never heard a gun fired, who was probably never exposed at all in battle, is to receive $24 a month, and the man who went in in 1861 and stayed through the war is to receive $24 a month.

I am seeking to urge that there is a limit to what can be appropriated, and that in the distribution of it the short-term men ought not to be increased simply on account of old age and disabilities, but that the amount the Government can appropriate should be distributed less to the short-service men and more to the long-service men. That is the basis of my motion to strike out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator states that he would not grant more than $12 per month to any soldier who was not actually in service. May I ask the Senator what he means by "actually in service"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mean out in the front, in battle.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator, then, would not pay more than $12 a month unless the evidence shows that the soldier was actually in battle?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or else during his service, though not in battle, some disability was brought upon him as an incident to his being in the service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Every division may have its own duties to perform during the continuance of a battle and both before and after a battle. Some company or some regiment may be sent off while the battle is continuing to some particular section to prevent a retreat of the enemy, and they may not have fired a gun. Does the Senator say that they were in battle or that they were out of battle?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but the Senator would say that the man who was in from the middle of 1861 to the last of 1865, with his regiment all the time, knew what battles were during that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. That does not answer my question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Take a three-year man; it is perfectly safe to say that he was in actual service and in battle.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator admit that a division of the Army which is sent around to some particular place while the battle is continuing to cut off the retreat of the enemy is engaged in the battle, or is not that division engaged in the battle? The Senator says that he would allow a pension of $12 per month if the soldier was not engaged in battle. It is rather difficult for me myself to determine what the Senator has in his mind when he says in service and out of service, and in battle and not in battle.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will try to explain it to the Senator a little more fully. The man who was with Grant for 12 months in Virginia, whether he was actually in a fight or not, was in active service. The truth is, I think that every soldier who was with Grant for six months in Virginia can be considered as having been actively in service. They all heard guns fired, and were in active service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, a great many people heard guns fired who were not in the Army at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, but these men were out in the front and heard them, and they were close enough to them to be injured by them.

I illustrate what I mean by these two men. Here was one man who enlisted in the summer of 1861 and was out in the service. I would not be technical about it. If a man was in the actual service for three years under Grant or some other officer who was in active service, and by some casualty was not in battle, I would certainly not discriminate against him. But what I do mean is that these very short-term men, who never were in the neighborhood of an actual battle, ought not to be pensioned as the men who gave three and four years of actual service at the front. These two men illustrate that case, one entering the Army March, 1865, and apparently not having crossed the Potomac, with nothing in the record to show that he got into actual service, and the other having for four years been actively in the service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, of course I am compelled to take a different view from that of the Senator on the basis of granting pensions. Under a general law I agree that the soldier who has answered the summons to battle, who has responded to the call of his country, who has done his duty as a soldier, who has gone wherever he was commanded to go, who may have suffered more in the long march or in trenches, where he never fired a gun, than many suffered in the acute stages of a short decisive battle, should be recognized by his country the same as though he had been in that actual battle; for, after all, we are granting our pensions because of the great national gratitude toward the old defenders of the country. Our gratitude is extended not so much because of what each soldier under the conditions was able to do, but what each soldier was willing to do if called upon by his Government; and as that is the basis of the sentiment of gratitude toward all of the old soldiers, I can not even agree with the Senator when he says that we should make such a great distinction between length of service.

Mr. President, under the last call of Lincoln for soldiers during the last year of the war we got in two classes. Those who responded were, first, the young men who were not old enough to go in in the beginning of the war, and there were the older men, who felt that the exigencies were such that their services were needed, even though they may have been past the best years of their young manhood.

Now, let us apply that case right here. I can not go into the details in each particular instance without the evidence before me; but if we grant one soldier $24 per month upon a length of service of five months and grant another soldier by special bill who served about eight years only $24 per month there must have been some distinction in their physical condition and in the reasons justifying our giving the short-service man the same consideration as we give the long-service man, because, other things being equal, we do recognize in our special pension legislation length of service, but we do not make length of service the sole standard.

It is probable that in this case the soldier with the longest service was in far better physical condition and perhaps did not have the same dependent upon him as the soldier of the shorter service. As our sentiment is a sentiment that flows from gratitude only, we wish that gratitude expressed in a manner that will do the most good. We must look at the two men face to face and say which of them is entitled, not because of length of service but because of their physical condition, to the greatest sum of money to prevent suffering from want or destitution. In these two cases, the one with the shorter service and the greater physical disability and the one with the longer service and the less physical disability, it was probably thought fair to balance the two, and that equal justice would be done if we granted both the same sum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator says that in fixing the amount of pensions, not simply what the soldier did but what the soldier was willing to do should be taken into consideration. I fully agree with him, and I turn to these two records to see what these two soldiers were willing to do. One of the soldiers, though a year younger than the other, was willing to volunteer in the summer of 1861. He was willing to go to the front in the hottest parts of the fights, and he did so. He was willing to stay through to the close—four years actually at the front, in battle time and again. The other, though a year older, was not willing to enter until 30 days before Lee surrendered. One was willing to fight four solid years; the other was willing to join the Army when there was practically no southern army left, when the war was practically over.

But the Senator says that the distinction rests upon their condition. I find from this report that the soldier who fought four years is described as being just as bad off now as the soldier who did not fight at all, so far as the record goes; as the soldier who, so far as his record goes, never crossed the Potomac. So we find that as to condition they are the same, and as to service they occupy an utterly different position.

I am not asking for an increase of pension to those who did no real service; I am insisting that that should not be done. I have moved to strike out the name of Mr. Jones because the record shows no real Army service; it shows he was in the Army, but it does not show that he was in the Army that was in front fighting; it shows distinctly that he did not join the Army until March, 1865.

As there is a limit to what we can appropriate, as there must be a limit to what the Government is to give, I am insisting that we do not put up the pensions of the men who were not in active service, who were not really in the battle line, or practically in the battle line, but that they be held down, in order that the increase may go to men of long service. I have simply taken this name and made this motion to strike out so that I might have the opportunity to present the line of thought that has been in my mind, and perhaps in a simpler and clearer way than I have had an opportunity of doing it before, and because I did not wish to continue to delay the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I were willing to draw upon my imagination for facts, I might make almost any kind of an argument on almost any kind of a proposition. The Senator from Georgia says that it is evident from the fact—if not in words, he says that at least in his argument—that the soldier did not enlist until March, 1865; that he was not as willing to go to war as the one who enlisted in the early part of the war. I have not the record of these two men before me; I do not know what is their prior history; I do not know what kept one man at home and allowed the other to go to war; I simply know that when the war was in its heat, when we were driving men to the front, when the butcher work was going on in the battles of the Wilderness, this man of short service enlisted. There may have been many reasons why he could not have enlisted before.

Let me give the Senator one reason within my knowledge: This man's name was not Jones, and he is not the same man, so I do not know whether the conditions in this case would have been at all applicable; but having had his acquaintance, I know of a young man whose mother was paralyzed and bedridden, he being her only support, who could not join the Army without leaving the mother unprotected. About a year, or less than a year before the Senator from Georgia would say the war was closed, the mother died and the son immediately joined the Army. I can not say that that soldier was not willing at all times to enlist, and I can not criticize him for not sooner entering the Army; neither can I criticize the other man, Mr. Jones, for not going into the Army earlier, when I do not know the reasons why he did not enlist at an earlier stage of the war. I simply know that he did enlist at the time named, that he served, that he answered the commands of his officers and went wherever he was commanded to go. Our past legislation has provided that in cases of that kind, when the soldier has served 90 days, he shall be entitled, if he is 75 years of age, to $20 per month, and under the old law of 1890 he would receive $12 per month. This man was so disabled and in such physical condition that even under the old law of 1890 it seems he had been allowed the full disability amount. So I think it is hardly fair to criticize, and I would not want to criticize, the soldier for not joining the Army earlier.

I agree with the Senator, other things being equal, that a distinction should be made on account of the length of service—the short service and the long service—but I do not know the facts that would equalize these cases. I would say, further, that if every soldier were to have a pension measured entirely by his deserts and each one got exactly what he ought to have, there would be just as many different rates of pension as there were soldiers in the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota intimates that I draw on my imagination, and yet he sustains the suggestion with no statement of fact. I have in no sense drawn upon my imagination, but I have drawn exclusively in this discusssion upon the report of the committee of which the Senator is chairman.

Speaking, however, of drawing upon one's imagination, the Senator did not even rely upon his imagination with reference to Mr. Jones. He undertook to give the history of some other man, explaining why some other man did not enter the Army earlier, without even suggesting the possibility that any facts had been presented to give such a reason explanatory of the conduct of Mr. Jones. I am not criticizing Mr. Jones for having failed earlier to enter the Army; I am not criticizing anyone; I simply state that he did not do it; I simply state that he did not render service. I simply call attention to the record which the Senator from North Dakota himself presents, that Mr. Jones never entered the Army until just about the time the war closed, and that the other soldier had been serving four years, and yet they are presented to us as suffering with the same injuries and it is proposed to grant them the same pension. For that reason I move to strike out the provision increasing the pension of the very short-term soldier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 1, noes not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5493.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

Cornelius S. Munhall, late of Company I, Twenty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Wilson Aler, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

John Jones, late of Company A, Sixteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $30.

William H. Ridgman, late of Company A, Twentieth Regiment, and Company C, Thirty-fifth Regiment, Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Daniel C. Grover, late of Company G, One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Warren Caswell, late of Company B, Seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Allen H. Benton, late of Company D, Thirty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Mounted Infantry, $24.

Charles H. Weeks, late of Company H, Forty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Elmore Y. Shelt, late of Company K, Forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $24.

William Smith Lackor, late of Company I, Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Henry Mingles, late of Company K, Forty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Edward V. Holland, late of Company B, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Benjamin Miller, late of Company B, Fifty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Mortimer Seymour, late of Company B, Seventy-third Regiment, and Company A, Twenty-ninth Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Henry H. Fackler, late of Company M, Seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

William B. Roberts, late of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Elijah B. Morris, late of Company A, First Regiment Delaware Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Warren Seaward, late of Company E, Sixteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Henry S. Bell, late of Companies F and A, First Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Daniel Powell, late of Company E, Sixth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Eli Sherman, late of Company I, Fourth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Isabella Oliver, widow of William Oliver, late of Company I, Thirty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, $20.

Lafayette Hall, late of Company C, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $30.

William Plate, late of Company D, Second Regiment West Virginia Veteran Volunteer Infantry, $24.

George R. Howard, late of Company E, Twenty-fourth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $50.

Annie D. Diamond, widow of Absalom S. Diamond, alias Henry Scott, late of Company C, Third Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, $12.

Francis M. Howard, late of Company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Joshua Pinkham, late of Company K, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Seba Coffin, late of U. S. S. Sabine and Niagara, United States Navy, $24.

Solomon Baker, late of Company D, Fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and Company I, Third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Washington Masters, late of Company H, Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Thomas S. Neal, late of Company C, Second Battalion Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Thomas Varner, late of Company C, Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Heavy Artillery, $24.

George Gorham, late of Company H, Thirteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Lewis C. Berg, late of Company K and principal musician, Twenty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $24.

William W. Day, late of Company D, Tenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Henry Bisbin, late of Company C, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Light Artillery, $40.

Marion L. Wilson, widow of Edward P. Wilson, late captain Company A, and major, Second Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Cavalry, $12.

Henry D. Lockwood, late of Company E, Twenty-third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Samuel Black, late of Company B, Forty-ninth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Joseph Larock, late of Company I, Fifth Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, $50.

Joseph S. Spencer, late of Company F, Fifty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, $24.

John Vander Horck, late captain Company D, Fifth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and captain Company H, Eighth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, $30.

Charles A. Fernald, late of Company E, Thirteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Harrison Buchanan, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, $24.

Mary B. Boyer, widow of John Boyer, late of Company F, One hundred and ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $12.

Ellen Brackett, widow of Edwin F. A. Brackett, late of Company H, Fiftieth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, $20.

John B. Randolph, alias John Brendo, late of Company G, Twenty-sixth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Alcenus Ward Fenton, late captain Company D, Sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

William Hartin, late of Company A, Second Regiment Maine Volunteer Cavalry, $24.

Graham M. Meadville, late of Company F, Seventy-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $30.

Joseph C. Bullock, late of Company K, Ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, $30.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 3 I move to strike out from line 10 to line 13, inclusive, being the item for Caleb Eldred, the beneficiary having died since the bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 9, it is proposed to strike out:

> The name of Caleb Eldred, late of Company F, Fifteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to be offered?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to move to strike out, on page 2, lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, inclusive, and I also move to strike out, on page 4, lines 19, 20, 21, and 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer to strike out the two items as one amendment or as two amendments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will include the two items in one amendment, because they embody the same view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 2 it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Wilson Aler, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

And on page 4, after line 18, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Shepard Goodwin Patrick, late of Company D, One hundred and fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire the Clerk to read the report of the committee on those two cases, and also to read the report of the committee on two other cases, the numbers of which I will give him within a few minutes.

The Secretary read as follows:

S. 63. Wilson Aler, of Lexington, Nebr., was formerly a private in Company A, Seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry. He served from February 15, 1865, to November 4, 1865, and was honorably discharged. He is at present in receipt of a pension of $12 per month under the service act of February 6, 1907. He never applied for pension under the general law, but formerly drew $6 per month under the act of June 27, 1890.

It appears, however, from medical and other testimony filed with this committee that claimant is helpless from rheumatism and paralysis and is unable to take care of himself and requires the aid and attendance of another person. He is over 68 years of age and very poor, being dependent upon his pension for his support, and his neighbors petition generally for his relief. An increase in his pension to $24 per month is recommended on the ground of his present condition; it is not due to his service, which was less than one year, and no greater increase is warranted.

* * * * * * *

S. 691. Shepard Goodwin Patrick was a private in Company D, One hundred and fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He served from May 14, 1864, to October 29, 1864, and was honorably discharged. He is at present in receipt of a pension under the service act of February 6, 1907, at the rate of $12 per month. He was formerly pensioned at $8 per month under the act of June 27, 1890. His application under the general law, filed December 6, 1897, was rejected August 4, 1900, on the ground of no ratable disability from malarial poisoning, and no record or other satisfactory evidence to prove service origin of disease of stomach, dyspepsia, and piles.

The claimant is 64 years of age. It appears from the report of his last medical examination, taken June 6, 1906, that he suffered from disease of digestive organs, rheumatism, and piles, and was practically unable to perform manual labor. Medical and other evidence filed with this committee is to the effect that claimant is unable to perform manual labor by reason of disease of stomach, bladder trouble, and rheumatism. He is poor and without property or means for his support. In such cases your committee usually grant substantial relief by doubling the pension, and increase to $24 is therefore recommended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 3, Senate bill No. 208, the case of Thomas J. North, and in the case of David C. Morgan, page 9, I ask the Secretary to read from the report of the committee. I do not move to strike out these items, but I desire the report read as illustrating the difference.

The Secretary read as follows:

S. 208. Thomas J. North was a private in Company E, First Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry. He enlisted August 25, 1861, and was honorably discharged December 31, 1864, having served three years and four months. He is a pensioner under the service act of February 6, 1907, at the rate of $15 per month. He never filed a claim under the general law, but formerly drew a disability pension of $10 per month under the act of June 27, 1890.

The claimant is now upward of 73 years of age, generally broken down and in needy circumstances. His last medical examination, taken October 19, 1904, showed that he suffered from rheumatism, lumbago, disease of heart, and senile debility, and was practically unable to perform manual labor, and medical evidence filed with this committee shows that he is now nearly blind in left eye and party so in right eye, and that he is afflicted with disease of heart, varicose veins, partial deafness, and other infirmities incident to old age, and is totally disabled for earning a support. Neighbors testify that claimant is unable to perform manual labor and that he has no property or income except his pension. On account of soldier's advanced age, his long continued and honorable service, his total disability and extreme poverty, your committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month.

* * * * * * *

S. 811. David C. Morgan was a corporal in Company B, Tenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted September 8, 1861, and was discharged August 9, 1865, having served nearly four years. He established a claim under the general law for malarial poisoning and disease of lungs, and is pensioned therefor at $14 per month. He was first pensioned at $8 per month from September 30, 1881; increased to $10 from June 5, 1889; to $12 from June 7, 1905, and to $14 from May 6, 1908. Claims for further increase were rejected August 6, 1909, and March 17, 1910.

Claimant is now 67 years of age. He was last examined at Buckhannon, W. Va., March 2, 1910, by a full board of surgeons, who rated him seventeen-eighteenths for malarial poisoning. Dr. Oscar B. Beer testified, in affidavit filed February 1, 1910, that soldier suffers from disease of lungs and malarial poisoning and is totally disabled for performing manual labor. Medical and other evidence filed with this committee is to the effect that claimant is also afflicted with rheumatism and piles and is unable to earn a support for himself and family. It also appears that claimant is poor and without source of income except his pension. On account of soldier's age, poverty, good record, and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, the committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire, Mr. President, to take up the time of the Senate again on this bill. I have simply presented two names that I have moved to strike out and two other names that I do not move to strike out—two very short-term men and two long-term men—as illustrating my view on the subject. I will not detain the Senate further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The motion was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the case of Thomas J. North I move to strike out the word "twenty-four" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 11, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-four" and in lieu thereof to insert "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to pension the persons named at the rates per month stated:

Alfred Faucher, late of Company F, Forty-third Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

George W. Simmons, late of Capt. Swindal's company, Second Regiment Washington Mounted Volunteer Infantry, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

John W. Barnes, late of Company H, First Regiment Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $16.

Thomas Gorman, late of Company B, First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Alan P. Wilson, late of Company I, Second Regiment Virginia Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

John H. Mumaw, late of Company I, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12.

Richard Burnside, late of Company C, Thirty-eighth Regiment United States Infantry, $10.

James Petree, late of Capt. W. H. Latshaw's company, Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Bertha B. Byrne, widow of Bernard A. Byrne, late lieutenant colonel Fortieth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $40, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said Bernard A. Byrne until they reach the age of 16 years.

George Berry, late of Company H, First Regiment Montana Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $24.

Roberson Ford, late of Capts. Kelly and Stafford's company, Oregon Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Allen Tyler, late of Sixteenth Battery United States Field Artillery, $16.

Willoughby Churchill, late of Company D (Capt. M. M. Williams), Second Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

John McCombs, late of Capt. John F. Miller's company, Oregon Mounted Volunteers, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war, $16.

Anne Jones Banks, widow of William Banks, late of Capt. William M. Allred's company, Nauvoo Legion, Utah Volunteers, Utah Indian war, $8.

Emily Whitman, widow of Luther Whitman, late of Capt. Ortons's company, New York Militia, War of 1812, $24.

Frank H. Lasher, late of Company D, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $16.

George A. Wageck, late of Company L, First Regiment Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $24.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to offer to the entire bill an amendment to this effect:

Provided, That on the 1st of January of each year each of said parties shall file with the Bureau of Pensions proof of the continuance of his disabilities. Otherwise he shall cease to receive the benefits of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That on the 1st of January of each year each of said parties shall file with the Bureau of Pensions proof of the continuance of his disabilities. Otherwise he shall cease to receive the benefits of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In offering this amendment I really do it more seriously as a suggestion to the Committee on Pensions with reference to these short-term young men who are going on the pension roll. It does seem to me that they occupy an entirely different attitude, going on the pension roll for disabilities not in the shape of the loss of arms or of wounds, than the old soldiers who have gone on under the general laws. It seems to me they occupy a different position with reference to the permanency of their disabilities from the old soldiers who have reached such an advanced age that there is no hope of recovery. But a young man, between 30 and 40 years of age, with nothing of the character of a loss that the Senator has referred to, which I did not have in contemplation and which I excepted in my statement, but he did not catch it—the loss of an arm or a leg or a wound that would necessarily be permanent—it seems to me ought to be required to furnish some evidence that the disabilities continue. I do not think the rule ought to apply to men who have reached 70 years of age, but we ought to have some kind of legislation that will provide that the Spanish-American soldiers shall furnish annually some kind of evidence, where the disability is not a wound or something which is necessarily permanent, to justify the continuance of their pensions; and I present the amendment really more suggestively than otherwise.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are several reasons why the amendment should not be adopted in the form, at least, in which it is written by the Senator. The first is that it is not applicable to all of the cases, and would be applicable to but very few of them. Six of these claimants, I believe, are veterans of the Indian wars, which occurred prior to the Civil War. Therefore those persons must be quite old, and the pension is granted not because of disability——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not mean to apply the amendment to them. I have been unable to go over the entire list, and I merely saw that a number of them were veterans of the Spanish War. I want to apply the principle only to young soldiers.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment would be inapplicable in the case of widows. There is no requirement of the widow of proof of disability.

Again, the third proposition is that which I expressed before, that the committee would not have reported favorably a private pension bill in any of these cases unless the evidence was conclusive, at least to them, that the injuries were such that the soldier would not recover therefrom.

Again, I quote the Senator the general law, which provides that where a pension is granted for any disability which may be temporary whenever the disability disappears, and that question in any form, either through the investigation of the department or otherwise, is brought to the attention of the department, the soldier's pension is discontinued if it can be shown that the disability has discontinued.

So I think it is unnecessary under the general law. I think that the department, with their special agents, which some one has already described as sleuths, will be able to find out if any soldier who is drawing a pension has recovered from the disabilities upon which the pension is based.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, of course the latter part of the Senator's remarks will apply to my amendment. That portion of them which called attention to certain cases of pensions in this bill that the amendment was not intended to apply to were facetious but not logical, as they had no reference to the subject under consideration.

With reference to these young men who are going on the pension roll, I believe we have 28,000 of the Spanish-American War on the pension roll. Probably two-thirds of those pensioners are pensioners who have no injury such as a wound or such as a physical disability that is necessarily permanent. I understand the Senator says the committee would not have put these people, or any of them, on unless they believed the injury permanent. But in the case of a troubled condition of the digestion, a malarial trouble, nobody can tell that an injury of that kind is permanent. There may be a present opinion that it is, but it is not a definite injury that can be determined as a permanent injury.

I shall not press this amendment in its present form, because it extends to all the parties, but I desire to amend it so as to apply to the living soldiers of the Spanish-American War contained in the bill under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia desire the Secretary to modify his amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I modify it to that extent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the modified amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the meantime, I ask the Chair to lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota, is laid aside temporarily. The Secretary will now state the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That on the 1st day of January of each year each of said parties shall file with the Bureau of Pensions proof of the continuance of his disabilities, otherwise he shall cease to receive the benefits of this act. But this is only to apply to the living soldiers of the Spanish-American War named in this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5670) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to ask the Senator if he meant to skip Senate 5624?

Mr. McCUMBER. There will be an amendment proposed to Senate bill 5624, and I would rather take it up when there are more in the Senate Chamber, because it becomes a precedent. It therefore becomes important; and I desire to have the vote of the entire Senate upon the amendment that will be proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5670.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 10, line 13, I move to strike out the name of Pickett and insert in lieu thereof the name "Prickett." This amendment is a mere typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to strike out, on page 15, lines 1 to 4, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, on page 15, in the following words:

The name of Joseph M. Wolbert, late of Company D, Fifty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Secretary to read the report of the committee in that case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report of the committee with reference to this case.

The Secretary read from page 37 of Senate Report No. 450, as follows:

S. 5172. Joseph M. Wolbert served as a private in Company D, Fifty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; was enlisted March 22, 1865, and honorably discharged July 28, 1865. He never applied for a pension under the general law, but established a claim under the act of June 27, 1890, and is now pensioned under said act at $12 per month, granted him for total incapacity for earning a support by manual labor. The claimant is now nearly 64 years of age. The report of his last medical examination, taken December 22, 1908, shows that he was disabled by disease of rectum, bronchitis, disease of stomach and bowels, and general debility, and the examining surgeon reported in direct terms that claimant was totally and permanently incapacitated for the performance of manual labor. Evidence filed with this committee shows that claimant is at present wholly unable to earn a support by manual labor by reason of bronchitis, hemorrhoids, and disease of bowels and rectum. It is also shown that claimant is in destitute circumstances, being entirely dependent upon his pension for the support of himself and family. On account of soldier's age, poverty, and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, the committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month; his service was short, hence no greater increase is warranted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now ask the Secretary to read the report of the committee applicable to the pension of George P. Doeg, prior to that of Joseph M. Wolbert. It is on page 36, S. 5078. I am not moving to strike out the report of the committee applicable to Mr. Doeg.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am only presenting the report of the committee as to him to illustrate my motion to strike out the increase of pension of Joseph M. Wolbert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read from page 36, Report No. 450, as follows:

S. 5078. George P. Doeg was a private in Company D, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted August 16, 1861, and was honorably discharged November 23, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability on account of gunshot wound of left hand, received in battle at Fort Wagner, S. C., July 18, 1863. He was originally pensioned under the general law for gunshot wound of left hand at $2 per month from discharge, which was increased to $3 from October 21, 1874; to $4 from June 2, 1880; and to $6 from March 2, 1895. He is now pensioned at $12 per month under the age or service act of February 6, 1907.

The claimant is nearly 70 years old. Evidence filed with this committee shows that he is disabled by gunshot wound of left hand, left inguinal hernia, rheumatism, dyspepsia, weak heart, and impaired sight, and a physician and two neighbors testify that he is entirely incapacitated for performing manual labor for his support. It further appears that claimant is poor and without property or source of income other than his pension. On account of soldier's advanced age, poverty, and inability to earn a support by his own manual labor, the committee recommend increase of pension to $24 per month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the final passage of the bill I wish to say a few words. The Senator from Georgia placed side by side what, from his judgment, would present the strongest possible case, by length of service and age, and one that would probably be the weakest that could be selected out of the number for a given amount. I call the attention of the Senate to the inability of any Senator to determine accurately from the report alone what ought to be granted. If all the evidence and the affidavits upon which the claim was based were before the Senate, it probably would arrive at the same conclusion the Senate committee arrived at in this case. It would probably be found that while the older man and the one who served the longer was, of course, physically disabled from performing manual service, in the case of the younger man and the one who had served a less number of years there was a very much greater physical disability, requiring the aid of a doctor very often, as in cases of hernia, sometimes very painful and distressing, sometimes demanding more or less aid and attention than are required by the older man. All of this evidence can not be carried out in detail, but only the conclusion given. I think if we had all of the evidence before us in each of the two cases we would find that the conclusion was accurately correct, if we base it upon the present physical condition, and grant the increase of pension to prevent destitution, rather than making our grant dependent entirely upon the length of service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is but one more of these pension bills upon the calendar, and, as I have suggested, we have not a very large attendance to-day, and I will call it up immediately after the morning business to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. RAUCH, and Mr. GOOD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the following bills:

S. 317. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sundance, in the State of Wyoming;

S. 318. An act to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Newcastle, Wyo.;

S. 3716. An act for the erection of a public building at St. George, Utah; and

S. 4493. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Thermopolis, in the State of Wyoming.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 17671) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CONSIDERATION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that 15 minutes be devoted to the consideration of District of Columbia bills, unobjected cases, to be called by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

HOME FOR FEEBLE-MINDED.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 5440) to establish a home for feeble-minded, imbecile, and idiotic children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a home for feeble-minded, imbecile, and idiotic children, to be under the control and supervision of the commissioners of the said District.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall have authority to make suitable rules and regulations for the government of the said home, including the admission of patients thereto, and shall also determine upon and appoint the necessary officers and employees and prescribe their duties and fix their salaries and compensation: Provided, That admissions to the said home shall be upon the certificate of the board of children's guardians of the District of Columbia, who shall certify that such children are residents of the said District and are feeble-minded, imbecile, or idiotic.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, one half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the erection of all necessary buildings for said home for feeble-minded, imbecile, and idiotic children in the District of Columbia: Provided, That said building shall be erected upon land now owned by the District of Columbia located in the subdivision in the southeastern section of said District known as Blue Plains.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE AVENUE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask to have considered the bill (S. 2504) to provide for the extension of New Hampshire Avenue, in the District of Columbia, on a straight line, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 1, page 2, line 8, after the word "in," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "resect" and insert "respect."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does all this revenue come from the District, I will ask the chairman? Is the Government to be taxed for any part of this revenue?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, not at all; not in any case in the opening of streets.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JURISDICTION OF POLICE COURT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 5271) to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the police court of the District of Columbia in certain cases.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment in section 2, page 2, line 5, after the word "months," to insert "and in default of bond may be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding six months," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the police court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction, concurrently with the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, of affrays and the keeping of a bawdy or disorderly house, and any person convicted of such an offense shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 2. That said police court shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with said supreme court of threats to do bodily harm, and any person convicted of such offense shall be required to give bond to keep the peace for a period not exceeding six months, and in default of bond may be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding six months.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPRING ROAD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5333) to authorize the widening and extension of Spring Road NW., and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to withhold that request, as a protest has come to me about the expense that will be involved by the passage of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I withdraw the request.

EXTENSION OF BUCHANAN STREET, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to provide for the extension of Buchanan Street NW., between Piney Branch Road and Sixteenth Street, and the abandonment of Piney Branch Road between Allison Street and Buchanan Street NW., District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POLICE AND FIREMAN'S PENSION FUNDS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5375) for the relief of the police and fireman's pension funds, District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to deposit in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the police and fireman's relief funds of the District, from the receipts from licenses (other than liquor licenses), in addition to the revenue now authorized by law, such sum as may be required to meet the deficiency now existing in the fund, and thereafter such sum as may be necessary from time to time to prevent deficiencies in the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISINTERMENTS IN DISTRICT CEMETERIES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1086) to amend sections 680 and 686 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, beginning in line 3, to strike out:

That section 680 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the following words: "In no case shall the grave be opened in which has been buried the body of any person who has died of Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), leprosy, the plague, tetanus, diphtheria, or scarlet fever."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 680 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following words: "within five years after the date of death," so that the last sentence of said section shall read as follows: "In no case shall a grave be opened in which has been buried the body of any person who has died of Asiatic cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox (including varioloid), leprosy, the plague, tetanus, diphtheria, or scarlet fever within five years after the date of death."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 14, after the word "said," to strike out "interment" and insert "disinterment," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That section 686 of said code as it now reads be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the following is hereby substituted therefor, namely:

"SEC. 686. Any body buried in the District of Columbia may be disinterred by the coroner of the District of Columbia, or upon his order, whenever said disinterment is, in his judgment, necessary to enable him to perform properly the duties of his office; and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or a justice thereof, may order the disinterment of any such body whenever, in the opinion of said court or justice, the same is necessary in an inquiry as to the cause of death of a person or for the purpose of the trial of any cause in said court, and the health officer of the District of Columbia shall issue a permit for this purpose upon request of the coroner or justice, as the case may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREFERENCE RIGHTS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5465) for the relief of holders and claimants of preference rights on public lands.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any unmarried woman who has heretofore acquired or shall hereafter acquire or be entitled to any preference right to file or make entry under the homestead laws of any public lands of the United States shall not forfeit or lose such right by becoming married before making such filing or entry, but may, under such preference right, make application for and enter and file upon such lands, or any part thereof, and receive patent therefor, notwithstanding her marriage after acquiring or becoming entitled to exercise such preference right: Provided, That the man she marries is not at the time of her attempting to exercise such preference right claiming a separate tract of land under the homestead laws, or has not therefor had the benefit of the homestead laws, and that any homestead entry made or attempted to be made by the husband, during the time the land entered pursuant to such preference right by the wife is held or claimed by her under the homestead laws, shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. That this act shall apply to all such preference rights heretofore acquired and now pending, undisposed of, or which may hereafter be acquired.

Mr. JONES. In section 1, page 2, line 21, after the word "not," in the substitute, I move to strike out the word "therefor" and to insert the word "theretofore."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 21, after the word "not," it is proposed to strike out the word "therefor" and to insert "theretofore."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY J. WEBSTER.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4839) for the relief of Mary J. Webster.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent to Mary J. Webster, her heirs and assigns forever, to the following-described tract of land in Fremont County, Idaho: The west half of the southwest quarter section 10, township 5 north, range 40 east, Boise meridian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANEUVERING GROUNDS AT ANNISTON, ALA.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 178) creating a commission to investigate and report on the advisability of the establishment of a permanent maneuvering grounds, camp of inspection, rifle and artillery ranges for troops of the United States at or near the city of Anniston, county of Calhoun, State of Alabama, and to likewise report as to certain lands in and around the city of Anniston, county of Calhoun, State of Alabama, proposed to be donated to the United States for said purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NORTH TOPEKA, KANS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4310) to provide for the erection of a public building at North Topeka, Kans.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "exceed," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-one," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed on the site to be acquired for that purpose a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office at North Topeka, Kans., the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed $71,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at North Topeka, Kans."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MARTINSBURG, W. VA.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2558) making an appropriation of public money to install an elevator in the United States public building at Martinsburg, W. Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "there be, and is hereby, appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of installing," and to insert "the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract for the installation of"; and in line 10, after the word "building," to insert "at a cost not to exceed $20,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract for the installation of an elevator in the United States courthouse and post-office building at Martinsburg, in the State of West Virginia, and for remodeling and replacing the main stairway of said building at a cost not to exceed $20,000. The work of installing said elevator and replacing the said stairway shall be done under the plans and specifications to be furnished by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the installation of an elevator in the United States public building at Martinsburg, W. Va."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FARMVILLE, VA.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1895) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Farmville, in the State of Virginia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the words "sum of," to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices, in the town of Farmville and State of Virginia, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRACTICE OF DENTISTRY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5244) to regulate the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT COEUR D'ALENE, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 248) providing for the erection of a Federal building at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "exceed," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "one hundred and seventy-five"; and on page 2, line 1, after the words "sum of," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "one hundred and seventy-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office, court, and other offices of the Government at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, the cost of said building aforesaid not to exceed $175,000. For the purposes aforesaid the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT POCATELLO, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will take the liberty of also asking for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5077) providing for the erection of a Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho. A Federal court sits there, but there is no courthouse.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two"; and in line 11, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected upon the site already acquired at Pocatello, Idaho, a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and the accommodation of the United States post office, court, and other offices of the Government at that place, the cost of said building aforesaid not to exceed $200,000. For the purposes aforesaid the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5060) to provide for the disposal of the unallotted land on the Omaha Indian Reservation in the State of Nebraska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was in section 2, page 2, line 18, before the word "acres," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to reserve from sale, under the terms of this act, the following tracts of land for the purposes designated: Forty-nine acres of the land now used for agency purposes to be reserved for agency and school purposes for so long as the need thereof exists; 10 acres to be selected by the tribe for use as a tribal cemetery; 10 acres of the land now reserved for the use of the Presbyterian Church to be selected by the officials of said church for the use of the church so long as needed for religious or educational purposes; 2 acres of the land on which is standing what is known as the old Presbyterian mission building, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause a patent in fee simple to issue therefor in the name of the State Historical Society of Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 1, after the word "act," to insert "and after reimbursing the general trust fund of the tribe for any assessment paid therefrom for protecting the unallotted tribal lands from overflow"; in line 8, after the word "page," to strike out "one" and insert "three"; and in line 11, after the word "be," to strike out "placed to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, until such time as the individual Indians shall have reached the age of 25 years, when the share to the credit of each Indian, with accrued interest, shall be paid to him upon application therefor through the Secretary of the Interior; but in the event of the death of such Indian prior to reaching the age of 25 years, his share shall be paid at once to his heirs under the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska" and insert "expended for the benefit of said Indians when and in such manner as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior shall be to their best interests, and pending such expenditure by the said Secretary the sums due the respective Indians shall be placed to the credit of the said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, but in the event of the death of any such Indian while there remains in the Treasury to his credit any part of the sum so deposited the said sum shall be paid at once to his heirs, who shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska, and the action of the Secretary of the Interior in determining the legal heirs of any deceased Indian, as provided herein, shall in all respects be conclusive and final," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the proceeds of such sale, after paying all the expenses incident to and necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act, and after reimbursing the general trust fund of the tribe for any assessment paid therefrom for protecting the unallotted tribal lands from overflow, shall be divided pro rata among the children of the Omaha Tribe living on the date of the passage and approval of this act who have not received allotments of land under the acts of August 7, 1882 (22 U. S. Stat. L., p. 341), and March 3, 1893 (23 U. S. Stat. L., p. 630), and shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians when and in such manner as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior shall be to their best interests, and pending such expenditure by the said Secretary the sums due the respective Indians shall be placed to the credit of the said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, but in the event of the death of any such Indian while there remains in the Treasury to his credit any part of the sum so deposited the said sum shall be paid at once to his heirs, who shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska, and the action of the Secretary of the Interior in determining the legal heirs of any deceased Indian, as provided herein, shall in all respects be conclusive and final.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that the report of the committee accompanying the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 459) submitted by Mr. BROWN, March 8, 1912, is as follows:

SALE AND DISPOSITION OF LANDS IN OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany S. 5060:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5060) to provide for the disposal of the unallotted lands on the Omaha Indian Reservation in the State of Nebraska, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

Page 2, line 15, strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Page 3, line 23, after the word "act" insert the following:

"And after reimbursing the general trust fund of the tribe for any assessment paid therefrom for protecting the unallotted tribal lands from overflow."

Page 4, line 3, strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Page 4, line 6, after the word "be," strike out the remainder of said line and all of lines 7 to 15, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Expended for the benefit of said Indians when and in such manner as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior shall be to their best interests, and pending such expenditure by the said Secretary the sums due the respective Indians shall be placed to the credit of the said Indians in the Treasury of the United States and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum; but in the event of the death of any such Indian while there remains in the Treasury to his credit any part of the sum so deposited the said sum shall be paid at once to his heirs, who shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska, and the action of the Secretary of the Interior in determining the legal heirs of any deceased Indian, as provided herein, shall in all respects be conclusive and final."

Your committee submits and makes a part of this report two letters from the Department of the Interior on the subject of the proposed legislation:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 14, 1912.

Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference of February 6, 1912, for consideration and report, of a copy of Senate bill 5060, Sixty-second Congress, second session, providing for the sale of the tribal lands of the Omaha Indian Reservation in Nebraska.

This department, on January 28, 1910, submitted to the Congress drafts of a bill authorizing the sale of the Omaha tribal lands, and in its letters accompanying said drafts set forth fully the facts relating thereto. See House Document No. 630, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

The Indians have expressed a desire to have 10 acres set aside for a tribal cemetery. It is respectfully recommended, therefore, that the word "seven" in section 2, line 15, page 2, be stricken out and the word "ten" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The word "one" in section 4, line 3, page 4, should be stricken out and the word "three" inserted in lieu thereof.

The act of February 18, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 628), authorized the payment of any assessments which may be made by any drainage district in the State of Nebraska on the tribal lands of the Omaha and Winnebago Indians, to protect such lands from overflow, from the tribal funds remaining to the credit of these Indians.

The estimated cost of drainage to protect the tribal lands of the Omaha Tribe is approximately $600. The lands subject to overflow will be greatly enhanced in value by the drainage provided for in the act of February 18, 1909, supra, and it is but just that the cost of draining these tribal lands should be paid from the proceeds derived from their sale. It is believed that provision should be made in the bill for reimbursing the tribal funds for the cost of draining the lands to be sold from the proceeds of the sale. This can be done by inserting after the word "act" in section 4, line 23, page 3, the following:

"And after reimbursing the general trust fund of the tribe for any assessment paid therefrom for protecting the unallotted tribal lands from overflow."

Section 4 of the bill provides that the proceeds derived from the sale of the tribal lands shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the individual credit of the unallotted children living at the date of the passage of the act, to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, each Indian to be paid his share with accrued interest when he reaches the age of 25 years.

The department is of the opinion that authority should be given the Secretary of the Interior to expend the share of individual Indians prior to the time they reach the age of 25 years, when, in his opinion, it will be to their advantage. It is not deemed advisable to have money deposited in the Treasury to the credit of these individual Indians which can not be used to provide for their education or to relieve sickness and distress.

It is respectfully recommended, therefore, that section 4 be further amended by striking out all that part thereof after the word "be" in line 6, page 4, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Expended for the benefit of said Indians when and in such manner as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior shall be to their best interests, and pending such expenditure by the said Secretary the sums due the respective Indians shall be placed to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, but in the event of the death of any such Indian while there remains in the Treasury to his credit any part of the sum so deposited the said sum shall be paid at once to his heirs, who shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska, and the action of the Secretary of the Interior in determining the legal heirs of any deceased Indian, as provided herein, shall in all respects be conclusive and final."

If amended as suggested herein, this department will be glad to see the enactment of Senate bill 5060, Sixty-second Congress, second session.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 8, 1909.

SIR: By direction of the President, I inclose a draft of a bill, the enactment of which into law at this session of Congress I consider extremely urgent, for reasons which I shall set out. The proposed measure provides for the disposal of all the unallotted land on the Omaha Indian Reservation in the State of Nebraska.

Allotments on the Omaha Indian Reservation were originally made in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 7, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 341). Allotments under this act to 954 members of the tribe were approved by the department on July 11, 1884, and the trust period for such allotments will expire on July 10, 1909.

Section 8 of the same act provided that the residue of lands, after all allotments had been made "* * * shall be patented to the said Omaha Tribe of Indians, which patent shall be of the legal effect and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented for the period of 25 years in trust for the sole use and benefit of the said Omaha Tribe of Indians, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Omaha Tribe of Indians in fee discharged of said trust and free of all charge or encumbrance whatsoever."

For reasons which the present administration of the department and of the Indian Office is unable to supply, no patent to the tribal lands was issued in accordance with the direction of the section quoted. It is easy to conceive, however, that a court of law might hold that the act was mandatory, and required the issuance of a trust patent for the tribal lands, and that, since this ought to have been done, a constructive trust period went into effect with regard to the tribal lands from the date of the completion of allotments in severalty on July 11, 1884, and would therefore expire on July 10, 1909.

In view of this possible and very probable interpretation of the act of August 7, 1882, that a constructive trust period is now in effect, which will expire on July 10, 1909, it is manifest:

1. That if no provision be made to meet the condition it needs only conflicting interests in the disposition of the unallotted lands to bring about much expensive and vexatious litigation and serious embarrassment to the administration of the affairs of these Indians.

2. That any legislation designed to meet the emergency, if such exists, must be passed at this session of Congress in order to be of any avail.

There are conflicting interests in the disposition of this unallotted land, which arose from the following conditions:

Section 8 of the act of August 7, 1882, supra, provided that, from the residue of lands to be patented to the tribe in common, allotments should be made and patented to each Omaha child born prior to the expiration of the time during which it was provided that the tribal lands should be held in trust (i. e., prior to July 10, 1909, on the constructive hypothesis herein outlined), the individual patents to override the patent to the tribe in common, and the lands so patented to the children to be segregated from the tribal lands. It is worthy of note, also, that the trust period on the proposed allotments to children was to expire, under the terms of this section, simultaneously with the expiration of the trust period on the tribal lands.

No allotments to children have been made under this section. The only allotments made from the residue of lands after the allotments of 1884 were made under the terms of the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 612, 630), which was amendatory in that it gave larger areas to children allotted under the former act, and provided for allotments to all women and children in being on March 3, 1893. The later act, however, did not repeal the former, so that there can be no doubt but that the children born since March 3, 1893, have been born into a right to an allotment of 40 acres each under the provision of the act of August 7, 1882, supra, so long as any is left of the tribal land.

The difficulty in carrying out the intent of this act at this time arises from the fact that there are now living 520 children of the tribe who, having been born since March 3, 1893, have received no allotments, and there is only about 4,500 acres of unallotted land, so that only 112 allotments of 40 acres each could be made to the 112 eldest unallotted children, leaving 408 children for whom no provision would be made. The prospect of such a disposition has aroused intense opposition among the parents of the 408 children who would thus receive nothing. Moreover, the unallotted land varies greatly in character and value, so that it was impossible equitably to divide it.

To pass a measure providing for the equal distribution of the tribal lands among all the living children would be open to serious objection, because this would give each child only about 8.6 acres, of unequal value—a quantity too small to be either cultivated or leased to advantage.

It would seem wiser to provide legislation designed to carry out the spirit of the act of August 7, 1882, the neglect to comply with the letter of it being a matter not susceptible of explanation at this time. The value in the open market of the tribal lands is variously estimated at $100,000 to $200,000. At the lower figure the sale of the lands and an equal distribution of the funds so arising among all the children would give each child about $190. The oldest child who could become a beneficiary under such a plan would be about 15 years of age when title passed to him for his share of $190. If this sum were placed to his credit in the Treasury at 5 per cent interest per annum until he was 25 years of age, the amount then due him would be $285. The younger the child at the date of the passage and approval of such act the greater the sum which would be his on reaching the age of 25 years.

Such is the purport of the accompanying bill, which is believed not only to furnish the best solution of the problem, but to meet the wishes of the majority of the tribe as expressed in open council, and in communications to the Indian Office. The bill contains certain reservations essential to the welfare of the tribe; provides for an Indian town near the present agency, which is a cherished dream of the Omahas; and gives the Nebraska Historical Society the old Presbyterian mission, which it is their desire to preserve as a landmark; and I strongly urge its enactment into law, and again call your attention to the fact that it is necessary that such an enactment be had at this session if at all.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD, Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

An act to provide for the disposal of the unallotted land on the Omaha Indian Reservation in the State of Nebraska.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be surveyed, if necessary, and appraised, in manner hereinafter set forth, in tracts of 40 acres each; and, after such survey and appraisement, to sell and convey, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres to any one purchaser, all the unallotted lands on the Omaha Indian Reservation in the State of Nebraska, except such tracts as are hereinafter specifically reserved: Provided, That the said land shall be sold to the highest bidder under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, but no part of said land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof: And provided further, That prior to such appraisement and sale, any member of the Omaha Tribe whose allotment is subject to erosion by the Missouri River shall be permitted to relinquish such allotment and select lieu lands of equal area from the unallotted lands, the lands so relinquished to become a part of the unallotted tribal lands and subject to appraisement and sale under the terms of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to reserve from sale under the terms of this act the following tracts of land for the purposes designated: Forty-nine acres of the land now used for agency purposes, to be reserved for agency and school purposes for so long as the need therefor exists; 7 acres, to be selected by the tribe, for use as a tribal cemetery; 10 acres of the land now reserved, for the use of the Presbyterian Church, to be selected by the officials of said church for the use of the church so long as needed for religious or educational purposes; 2 acres of the land on which is standing what is known as the old Presbyterian mission building, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause a patent in fee simple to issue therefor in the name of the State Historical Society of Nebraska: Provided, That of the land now reserved for agency purposes the Secretary of the Interior is directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes 164 acres, other than the 49 acres hereinbefore reserved, and shall cause the same to be surveyed and platted into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, the lots to be appraised and sold under the terms of this act, but no bid shall be received therefor except from members of the tribe, and the streets, alleys, and parks are hereby dedicated to the public use.

SEC. 3. That the appraisement directed by this act shall be made by three competent commissioners to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, after the completion of the surveys herein directed and authorized, one of whom shall be a resident citizen of the State of Nebraska, one an employee of the Indian Bureau, and one holding tribal relations with the Omaha Indians, said commission to be paid a salary of not to exceed $5 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and appraisal of said land, such appraisement to be completed within such a period after the date of the organization of said commission as the Secretary of the Interior shall designate.

SEC. 4. That the proceeds of such sale, after paying all the expenses incident to and necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be divided pro rata among the children of the Omaha Tribe living on the date of the passage and approval of this act who have not received allotments of land under the acts of August 7, 1882 (22 U. S. Stat. L., 141), and March 3, 1893 (23 U. S. Stat. L., 630), and shall be placed to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum until such time as the individual Indians shall have reached the age of 25 years, when the share to the credit of each Indian, with accrued interest, shall be paid to him upon application therefor through the Secretary of the Interior; but in the event of the death of such Indian prior to reaching the age of 25 years, his share shall be paid at once to his heirs under the laws of descent in force in the State of Nebraska.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

SEC. 6. All acts and parts of acts not consistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SADDLE MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, OREG.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2186) to set apart certain lands in the State of Oregon as a public park, to be known as the Saddle Mountain National Park.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all those certain tracts, pieces, or parcels of land lying and being situate in the State of Oregon and within the boundaries particularly described as follows, to wit: The south half and the northeast quarter of section 7, and the west half and the southeast quarter of section 8, and the southwest quarter of section 9, and the northwest quarter of section 16, and the north halves of sections 17 and 18, in township 5 north, range 8 west; and the southwest quarter of section 27, and the southeast quarter of section 28, and the north half of section 33, and the northwest quarter of section 34, and the northwest quarter and the southwest quarter of section 28, and the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of section 29, in township 6 north, range 8 west of the Willamette meridian, are hereby reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States and dedicated and set apart as a public park or pleasuring ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, to be known and designated as the Saddle Mountain National Park, and all persons who shall locate or settle upon or occupy the same, or any part thereof, except as hereinafter provided, shall be considered trespassers and be removed therefrom.

SEC. 2. That said park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to make and publish such rules and regulations as he many deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition as far as practicable. He shall provide against the wanton destruction of the fish and the game found within said park and against their capture or destruction for the purposes of merchandise or profit, and generally shall be authorized to take all such measures as shall be necessary to fully carry out the objects and purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant leases, transportation and other privileges, covering the occupation and use of lands and the transaction of business for the accommodation of tourists within the park. Such privileges may include the development and working of the resources in said park, but shall not be granted for any purpose inconsistent with that for which the park is established, or which would injure or destroy any of the forests, natural wonders, and other objects of interest or resort in the park, or prevent access to any of such objects or the enjoyment thereof by the people. Leases or privileges granted shall run for a period of not to exceed 20 years, but may be renewed or extended at the expiration thereof; no exclusive privilege, however, shall be granted within the park except upon the ground leased. The Secretary of the Interior may exact such charges as he deems proper for leases, privileges, etc., granted hereunder, and all funds derived therefrom, or from any source whatsoever connected with the park, shall be expended under his direction in the management, protection, and improvement of the park.

SEC. 4. That all persons who shall unlawfully intrude upon said park or who shall without permission appropriate any object therein, depredate on the game or fish, or commit unauthorized injury or waste in any form whatever upon the lands or other public property therein, or who shall violate any of the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, be fined in a sum not more than $500, or be imprisoned for a period not more than 12 months, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENALTY FOR DESERTION OF SEAMEN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5757) to abolish the penalty of imprisonment for desertion of seamen from vessels of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that imprisonment as a penalty for desertion of seamen from vessels of the United States and for neglect or refusal to join the vessel is abolished.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill. I merely want to know what you are going to do with these men if you can not imprison them. How are you going to punish them?

Mr. NELSON. Two or three years ago we abolished imprisonment in the coastwise service. This bill was introduced at the instance of the Department of Commerce and Labor, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Navigation that we ought to abolish imprisonment in our foreign service. The law as it exists now relates only to ships in the foreign service.

Mr. HEYBURN. I felt curious to know how you are going to punish a man who violates the law.

Mr. NELSON. This repeals the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it does; but suppose a man misbehaves himself; what are you going to do with him?

Mr. NELSON. The bill does not apply to such cases. It applies only to cases of desertion.

Mr. LODGE. In the merchant service.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the penalty?

Mr. LODGE. They lose their pay.

Mr. NELSON. They lose their pay.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all? I have no doubt Senators have given consideration to the bill——

Mr. NELSON. It is a recommendation of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would not cut much figure with me.

Mr. NELSON. And it is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. The recommendation of anybody outside of Congress does not go very far with me. Our wisdom here is the criterion with me, and I say that not in any invidious sense, but I am tired of hearing of the recommendations of the departments in the enactment of laws to preserve the peace and maintain the service of those who enlist. While I do not object to the bill, I shall at least interpose these suggestions, and somebody in the future may take them up and elaborate them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MANNINGTON, W. VA.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2689) to provide for the erection of a public building at Mannington, W. Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five," and after the word "dollars," in line 11, to strike out the remainder of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office at Mannington, W. Va.; the cost of said building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed $75,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY R. DRAKE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3917) for the retirement of Henry R. Drake, captain, Philippine Scouts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place Henry R. Drake, a captain of the Philippine Scouts, upon the retired list of the Army with the rank of captain of Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have the report of the committee in this case printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report of the committee will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 423) submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK February 29, 1912, is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3917) for the retirement of Henry R. Drake, captain, Philippine Scouts, has carefully considered same and reports it back to the Senate favorably with the recommendation that it pass without amendment.

The following facts in the case are presented in support of the recommendation for favorable action:

Capt. Henry R. Drake, captain of the Philippine Scouts, having formerly served as an enlisted man, and later as a sergeant in the Regular Army, has been in the military service 27 years, 42 years of age.

On October 24, 1909, while taking a prescribed exercise with other officers, he accidentally slipped and fell and fractured his left hip. His left leg was put in a plaster cast, and he was taken to Manila, P. I., where he remained until a year and a half ago. He has been since then in San Francisco, having been continuously in hospital for over two years. It is contended that his case presents one of malpractice or mistakes by military surgeons. His leg was prematurely taken from its plaster cast, thus preventing the setting of the hip. He was subjected to two X-ray examinations, one of 25 minutes and one of 20 minutes, each inflicting severe burns not yet healed. Later his hip and his knee were each subjected to a proper X-ray exposure of 30 seconds, and several operations were performed to cure the burns. The authorities say that he will be a cripple for life.

Capt. Drake suffered greatly over a long period of time. His military record is good, and he is a man of no means. The War Department recommends the passage of this bill, S. 3917, to place him upon the retired list of the Army with the rank of captain of Infantry.

HARRIET B. ANDERSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. RAYNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4213) for the relief of the estate of Harriet B. Anderson and others.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the personal or legal representatives of the following estates, which paid taxes in the internal-revenue district of Maryland, namely, estates of Harriet B. Anderson, Emanuel Bowman, Henry A. Clarke, John M. Comstock, Henry Heldorfer, Albertus L. Horner, Walter B. McAtee, Susan McCullock, Mary G. Simms, Parthena Thyson, and John J. Wight, such sums of money as have been in any manner collected from those estates as internal-revenue taxes paid on legacies and distributive shares of personal property to the United States under the war-revenue act of June 13, 1898.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to inquire whether the bill simply removes the statute of limitations?

Mr. RAYNER. That is all; in accordance with the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Knowlton against Moore.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CORVALLIS, OREG.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5491) for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Corvallis, Oreg.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Federal offices at Corvallis, in the State of Oregon, the cost not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 22, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 21, 1912.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 21, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, let Thy blessing descend upon us. Open our eyes to the truth, and give us the courage and the fortitude to follow in its wake.

Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again—
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshipers.

So may we know the truth, assimilate it, live it, and at last be glorified in it, with the Lord from heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. In a legislative way this is Monday, by order of the House, and the Clerk will call the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to ask whether a bill that had not been on the calendar a sufficient length of time last Monday can be considered to-day?

The SPEAKER. Of course it can.

Mr. RUSSELL. Suppose it was on the calendar only one day on last Monday.

The SPEAKER. If it has been on the printed calendar three days, it can be considered.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understood that matters would stand to-day exactly as they would have stood if these bills had been considered last Monday, and therefore that they would have to be on the calendar three days prior to last Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not thought of that.

Mr. SULLOWAY. To-day was substituted for last Monday by order of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the Speaker that this is not Monday. It seems to me that any bill that has been on the calendar for three days now is in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. This is Monday, in contemplation of the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Speaker refresh his recollection by having the order read.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely what the Chair is going to do. The Chair will have the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That the regular business for Monday, March 18, 1912, be postponed until Thursday, March 21, 1912. (Order agreed to March 16, 1912.)

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest, if the Speaker will permit, that under that order a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that had not been there long enough on Monday last would not be in order to-day.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is my point.

Mr. NORRIS. A Member might know that a bill had not been on the calendar long enough on Monday, and he might go away in the perfect assurance that it could not come up under unanimous consent. It seems to me that it would not be right to consider it to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska what is the object of this three days' notice, anyway?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume the object of the three days' notice is to notify the membership generally that at that particular time some particular bill will be taken up. Now, a man might have been watching the calendar, intending to object to a bill on last Monday. If the bill that he wanted to object to was not on the calendar he would give it no further attention, knowing that that day had been put over until to-day and that only what was in order on last Monday would be in order to-day. It seems to me that what would not be in order on last Monday ought not to be in order to-day.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, we can not make the rules of the House to suit the convenience of Members who are absent or who are not informed as to what is on the calendar. The fact is that to-day is not Monday, but is Thursday; but by an order of the House matters that would have been in order on Monday are in order to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct; matters in order on Monday would be in order to-day, but matters that were not in order on Monday would not be in order to-day.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is not accurate in his statement. Matters that were in order on Monday are in order to-day, but the right of matters to be on the calendar is determined by the fact that they have been there three days prior to the consideration of the calendar, and the three days is determined by the physical fact that to-day is Thursday and not Monday.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I insist that under the order of the House matters not in order on Monday would not be in order to-day. By order of the House to-day was substituted for Monday, and no prior right can come in over and above what was in order on that day, and to-day pensions are now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as soon as we are through with the Unanimous Consent Calendar, motions to suspend the rules are in order. The recollection of the Chair is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] was the first Member to apply to the Chair or notify the Chair that he desired to be recognized for a motion to suspend the rules, and the Chair will carry out the agreement.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of bills by unanimous consent is an extraordinary proceeding and ought to be conducted with great care. The rule in regard to the Unanimous Consent Calendar was established because Members thought they ought to have a right to have a bill taken up by unanimous consent, whether the Speaker was in favor of it or not. Speaker CANNON said that it was a great relief to the Speaker, and the Chair thoroughly agrees with him.

The philosophy of the three days' notice is that Members shall have three days' notice of the fact that unanimous consent is to be asked to take up certain bills. When the question was raised some time ago as to whether Sunday ought to be counted as part of the three-day period, the Chair ruled that in counting the three days Sunday was non dies, because there was no calendar printed on that day, and of course did not give a Member notice. The duty of Members is to be here every day and attend to the business of the House, and the Chair holds that if a bill has been on the calendar three days prior to to-day it is in order.

Mr. RODDENBERY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I rise to present a privileged resolution under the rules and the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will send it to the Clerk's desk, that it may be pending.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Georgia has not been recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not been recognized for that purpose. The rule says that immediately after reading the Journal the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be called, and although the gentleman applied to the Speaker to be recognized to offer the privileged resolution, the Speaker refuses to allow that to be done.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I submit that under the rules of the House and the Constitution this resolution is in order, although there may be a special order, although it may be Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and although there may be other preferential motions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remedy is by an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that appeal I desire to be heard.

Mr. SHERLEY. I move to lay the appeal on the table.
Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the appeal.

INVESTIGATION OF WATER RESOURCES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.
The Clerk read as follows:
A bill (H. R. 9056) to continue the investigation of water resources.
The Clerk read the bill at length.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?
Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.
Mr. PAGE. I object.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina objects and the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CONDEMNED CANNON TO ARMY AND NAVY UNION.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 239, authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver a condemned cannon to the Army and Navy Union, United States of America.
The Clerk read House joint resolution 239, as follows:
Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of Charles H. Baxter, first vice president of the Army and Navy Union, United States of America, one dismounted bronze cannon used in the Civil War, to be used by the Army and Navy Union for the purpose of furnishing official badges of the order: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States through the delivery of said condemned cannon.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House joint resolution?
There was no objection.
The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF FEES AND COSTS IN THE DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19418) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to regulate fees and costs, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1875.
The Clerk read the bill, as follows:
Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to regulate fees and costs, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 5. That if any clerk of any district court of the United States shall willfully refuse or neglect to make any report, certificate, statement, or other document required by law to be by him made, or shall willfully refuse or neglect to forward any such report, certificate, statement, or document to the department, officer, or person to whom by law the same should be forwarded, the President of the United States is empowered, and it is hereby made his duty in every such case, to remove such clerk so offending from office by an order in writing for that purpose; and the President may also at any time, by like order made after hearing, remove such clerk for neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, or inefficiency. And upon the presentation of such order, or a copy thereof, authenticated by the Attorney General of the United States, to the judge of the court whereof such offender is clerk, such clerk shall thereupon be deemed to be out of office and shall not exercise the functions thereof, and such district judge shall appoint a successor. Such person so removed shall not be eligible to any appointment as clerk or deputy clerk for the period of two years next after such removal."
SEC. 2. That all acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.
The following committee amendments were read:
First. In page 2, line 5, strike out the words "neglect of duty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "misappropriation of any money coming into his hands as such or for other."
Second. In page 2, line 6, strike out the words "or inefficiency," so the clause as amended will read:
"And the President may also at any time, by like order made after hearing, remove such clerk for misappropriation of any money coming into his hands as such or for other malfeasance in office."
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?
There was no objection.
Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, on December 21 last the President said in his message to Congress:

The report of the Attorney General shows that he has subjected to close examination the accounts of the clerks of the Federal courts; that he has found a good many which disclose irregularities or dishonesty; but that he has had considerable difficulty in securing an effective prosecution or removal of the clerks thus derelict. I am certainly not unduly prejudiced against the Federal courts, but the fact is that the long and confidential relations which grow out of the tenure for life on the part of the judge and the practical tenure for life on the part of the clerk are not calculated to secure the strictness of dealing by the judge with the clerk in respect to his fees and accounts which assures in the clerk's conduct a freedom from overcharges and carelessness. The relationship between the judge and the clerk makes it ungracious for members of the bar to complain of the clerk or for department examiners to make charges against him to be heard by the court, and an order of removal of a clerk and a judgment for the recovery of fees are in some cases reluctantly entered by the judge. For this reason I recommend an amendment to the law whereby the President shall be given power to remove the clerks for cause. This provision need not interfere with the right of the judge to appoint his clerk or to remove him.

It was in pursuance of that recommendation of the President of the United States that this bill was drawn, and it was drawn so as to enlarge the President's power of removal under existing law. Under existing law—that is, under the act of February 18, 1875—the power of the President in such case was as folllows:

That if any clerk of any district or circuit court of the United States shall willfully refuse or neglect to make any report, rectificate, statement, or other document required by law to be by him made, or shall willfully refuse or neglect to forward any such report, certificate, statement, or document to the department, officer, or person to whom, by law, the same should be forwarded, the President of the United States is empowered, and it is hereby made his duty, in every such case, to remove such clerk so offending from office by an order in writing for that purpose.

We propose in this bill to enlarge the power of the President to remove the clerk for misappropriation of any moneys coming into his hands as such clerk, or for other malfeasance in office. The bill as I originally introduced it read in this way—remove such clerk for neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, or inefficiency.

However, when we had the matter under consideration by the whole committee, having had suggestions, I may say, from some of the judges, the committee concluded to adopt the language which has been reported in the bill under consideration by way of amendment, so that the President shall have the power to remove such clerk for misappropriation of any moneys coming into his hands as such clerk or for other malfeasance in office. I may say that my attention has been called to the necessity for this legislation in several ways. I need not specify them here, but the information has come to me that there are about 20 clerks or more who have moneys in their hands for which they have refused to account. In other words, it seems that some of them have misappropriated—perhaps embezzled—money in their hands, and there is no power resting in the President of the United States to remove them for that reason. This bill simply enlarges the present law, so that in such cases where the clerk has failed to properly account for money, or has misappropriated money, or has money in his hands which he fails to turn over, the President can remove the clerk from office.
Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.
Mr. OLMSTED. I notice that the bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Alabama provided that a clerk might be removed for neglect of duty or for inefficiency, but those provisions are proposed to be stricken out. How, then, will a clerk be disposed of if neglectful of duty or inefficient?
Mr. CLAYTON. This is a matter which is left with the judge. The judge can remove him for neglect of duty and for inefficiency. The President can remove him under existing law if he neglects to make any report, certificate, statement, or other document required by law to be made by him. That leaves his removal for mere neglect of duty or inefficiency, whatever that may mean, with the judge, as it is left with him now. By this bill we merely add this provision to the law, that the President may remove the clerk for misappropriation of any moneys coming into his hands as such clerk and for other malfeasance in office.
Mr. OLMSTED. Can not the judge now remove him for misappropriation of funds?
Mr. CLAYTON. The judge can; but the President called the attention of Congress to the difficulty in his message, which I read and which I hope the gentleman heard.
Mr. OLMSTED. I am quite in favor of that; but I would like to extend the power so that he might remove for neglect of duty or for inefficiency, as the gentleman provided in his bill as originally drawn.
Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the committee unanimously agreed to the bill as presented here in the report, and therefore I can not agree to the suggestion which has just been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.
Mr. OLMSTED. I think the gentleman's bill was better before the committee amended it.
Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps so. It was more far-reaching, but the committee was not willing to go that far; and I may say that the committee was informed of the views of the Department of Justice, and was also informed of the views of some of the judges in respect to the matter. The committee thought that perhaps "neglect of duty" or "inefficiency" were terms subject to too much latitude of construction, and thought it safer and better to meet the exigency to which the President of the United States called attention in his message, viz, cases where the clerks have money in their hands or have embezzled money and have not been removed, and so framed the law as to have it fit the specific evil which the President mentions in his message of December 21.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, it was very difficult to hear over here while the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary was addressing the House. I want to say that I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] to say that there were a number of cases which came to the attention of some of the authorities showing that there was a withholding of public moneys by clerks of courts, and that there were cases of embezzlement in the Federal courts by clerks. Is that so?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; and the President called atttention to it in his message of December 21 last, an excerpt from which I have just read to the House.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What I want to know is this: Does the gentleman from Alabama know any reason why the Department of Justice did not request the judge to remove the clerk who had embezzled moneys?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], I beg to say that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has no information as to what request the Attorney General may or may not have made of any judge of any Federal court anywhere in respect to the conduct of any particular clerk. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary knows that his attention was directed to this matter by the message of the President of the United States, sent to Congress on December 21 last. He also knows by communication with the Attorney General that it is alleged there are some clerks who have not acccounted for public funds in their hands, and who may have embezzled public funds.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. They ought to be punished.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I may say to the gentleman that I have taken him into my full confidence and given him all the possible information that I have on the subject. I may say that I have given the gentleman the reasons for this legislation. The President is right in his recommendation, the Attorney General was right in his suggestions to me that the legislation was proper; the committee, I think, was right in presenting this bill, and I came to the conclusion that the changes in the modifications suggested to the committee, which are incorporated in the shape of the committee amendments, are proper, and I hope the bill in its present form will pass.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to take issue with the Judiciary Committee or disagree with them upon the proposition, but I am opposed to the provisions of this bill. I am opposed to giving the President of the United States the power to remove an officer whom he does not appoint. I say if the judges who create the district clerks have not the manhood and the moral courage to remove them, pass some kind of a drastic measure that will remove the judges. It is too far from the seat of the court and is giving to the President more power than he should have. Whether any gentleman on this floor agrees with me on that proposition or not, I do say it is a bad law, in my judgment, to pass; it is a bad law to place upon the statute books, whereby the President is given the power to remove a man who is not his appointee. I know in some instances that it has been urged, and I know in some cases the clerks have been influenced by local surroundings, and, in my judgment, that is what this bill will give to the President—the power; and if the clerk does not do as they want him to do in some places they will make some report against him, and upon investigation the clerk will be removed by the President. I say let us give to the power that appoints the clerk the power to remove him.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, just one word in reply. This does not add anything to the power now vested in the President, except it allows him to remove a clerk from office for misappropriation of moneys coming into his hands as such, or for other malfeasance in office; and I think it is entirely right and proper, and the President states the embarrassment that arises in such cases and why clerks who are embezzlers have not been removed. I think this power can safely be intrusted to the President; I think it could be safely intrusted to any President, and I am sure that it can be intrusted to the present occupant of the White House, and I am sure that it can be intrusted to the next occupant of the White House, whether it is my colleague from Alabama or the present occupant of the Speaker's chair. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In page 2, line 5, strike out the words "neglect of duty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "misappropriation of any moneys coming into his hands as such or for other."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In page 2, line 6, strike out the words "or inefficiency," so the clause as amended will read: "And the President may also at any time, by like order made after hearing, remove such clerk for misappropriation of any moneys coming into his hands as such or for other malfeasance in office."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the House of Representatives of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20111. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5045. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to authorize Capt. John W. Gulick, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the Republic of Chile; and

S. 5718. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5045. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to authorize Capt. John W. Gulick, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the Republic of Chile; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 5718. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17671. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

DAM ACROSS WHITE RIVER, COTTER, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20347) to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Dixie Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, with principal offices in the city of Little Rock, Ark., its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the White River at or near the town of Cotter, Ark., in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "with principal offices in the city of Little Rock, Ark."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "river," insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

To authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, his motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18849) for the relief of the Winnebago Indians of Nebraska and Wisconsin.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, when the amount of tribal funds due the Winnebagoes in Wisconsin shall have been ascertained, in accordance with the enrollment made by him under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 798), to expend said funds for their benefit in such manner, including the purchase of lands for said Indians, as he may deem proper, or, in his discretion, to distribute said funds, or any part thereof, per capita among said Indians: Provided, That in adjusting the present indebtedness of the Nebraska branch of the tribe to the Winnebago branch of Wisconsin the Secretary is hereby authorized to deduct from the share of the trust funds of the Nebraska Winnebagoes such amount as may be found due the said Wisconsin branch and to transfer the amount so deducted to the credit of the Winnebagoes belonging to the Wisconsin branch of the tribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have a statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman from Illinois a special question which he wishes to ask concerning this bill?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that the Winnebago Indians reside partly in Nebraska and partly in Wisconsin. There are two bands of them. These Indians in 1909 had their funds capitalized, the total sum coming to the two bands of Indians being $883,000. It becomes necessary for the Secretary to ascertain the number of Indians in Nebraska separately from those which are in the State of Wisconsin, so that after he makes this allotment it can be made per capita to each band of Indians separately, and after this is ascertained there will be no trouble in making a per capita payment under the bill, already passed, allotting to them $883,000.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has transmitted to you, as chairman of the committee, a proposed amendment requiring the enrollment of both branches of the tribe before this becomes operative?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is true; and the amendment is embodied in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think it is not embodied in the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Not as I heard the bill read from the desk.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not know what amendment the gentleman refers to. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS], the author of the bill, will explain it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I will say in answer to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] that the amendment to which he refers is not the amendment that was originally provided 8 or 10 years ago. Is this a recent matter?

Mr. ESCH. A recent matter, I understand. It has been transmitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior within the last few days. I supposed it had been received by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The point is this: There has been an enrollment of the census made of the Wisconsin branch for 1910; there has been no enrollment of the census of the Nebraska branch since 1881. The Indian Office states that there will be a census of the new branch of the tribe as of June 20, this year, before there shall be an allotment of these trust funds. I think the gentleman will realize the propriety of such an amendment in view of the difference of time in the censuses of the two branches of the tribe.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I will be glad to have the gentleman offer his amendment. I have not heard from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, and I will be glad to have the gentleman offer his amendment for consideration.

Mr. ESCH. I have not the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] that if it goes off the calendar to-day it could be replaced on the calendar a week from Monday.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. Without objecting to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object for the reasons which I have stated.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

EXHIBIT AT CORN EXPOSITION, COLUMBIA, S. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the House concurrent resolution No. 36, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the Fifth National Corn Exposition at Columbia, S. C.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 36.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby authorized to make such exhibit as may be convenient and practicable at the Fifth National Corn Exposition, to be held at Columbia, S. C., January 27 to February 9, 1913.

Also the committee amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in."

The question was on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make such arrangements with the proper officers of the said exposition that the Department of Agriculture shall be at no expense for transportation of said exhibit to and from the exposition: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also make such arrangements with the proper authorities of said exposition that there shall be no expense to the department for any breakage or damage that may occur to the exhibit, nor for the living expenses of such appointees as he may see fit to send to said exposition to demonstrate the exhibit sent."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended House concurrent resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that it ought to be a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I submitted it to the Secretary of Agriculture, and he thought it ought to be a concurrent resolution. I do not suppose it makes any particular difference.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it may be that the Secretary of Agriculture now has the authority to do this, but it is perfectly plain that this does not confer the authority upon him.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Secretary of Agriculture now thinks he has authority.

Mr. MANN. Let us make it a joint resolution. It is just as easy and will be in better form.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois I am quite willing to make this a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution, and I ask that that may be done.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will offer a proper amendment it can be changed.

Mr. MANN. It should be made to read, "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled," a joint resolution.

Mr. LEVER. I move, Mr. Speaker, to strike out "concurrent" and insert "joint."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment to amend the enacting clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the enacting clause in lines 1 and 2 so as to read:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, the title should be changed also.

The SPEAKER. That can be done afterwards. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution (No. 276).

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the author of the resolution a question. Is it intended that the authorities or the association that is giving this exposition shall be responsible and repair any breakage or damage that may be done to the exhibit?

Mr. LEVER. That is the understanding.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The resolution does not so provide. It simply says in effect that the department shall be put to no expense on account of any breakage or damage, but it does not say that the association or the officers of the exposition shall make the breakage or damage good.

Mr. LEVER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this language:

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make such arrangements with the proper officers of the said exposition that the Department of Agriculture shall be at no expense for transportation of said exhibit to and from the exposition: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also make such arrangements with the proper authorities of said exposition that there shall be no expense to the department for any breakage or damage that may occur to the exhibit nor for the living expenses of such appointees as he may see fit to send to said exposition to demonstrate the exhibit sent.

Of course, under that authority the Secretary of Agriculture would have the right to require the exposition authorities to give bond for the security of those things.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If that is the construction, that would be all right, but it did not seem to me probable that that would be the construction.

Mr. MANN. A bond or deposit could be given.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If a bond or deposit should be made or required it would be all right, but I question if that would be required under this language.

Mr. LEVER. I think the Secretary has full authority to do that and would do so in practice.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended House joint resolution.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the joint resolution was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the Fifth National Corn Exposition, at Columbia, S. C."

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ISLANDS GRANTED TO WISCONSIN FOR FORESTRY PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13417) granting unsurveyed and unattached islands to the State of Wisconsin for forestry purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause patents to issue to the State of Wisconsin for the unsurveyed and unattached islands in inland lakes north of the township line between townships 33 and 34 north, fourth principal meridian, as additions to the State forest reserves. The islands hereby granted shall be used as additions to the forest reserves only, and should the State of Wisconsin abandon the use of said islands for such purpose, alienate or attempt to alienate or use the same or any part thereof for purposes other than that for which granted, the same shall revert to the United States.

Also the following committee amendments:

Amend, page 1, by striking out, in lines 3 and 4, the words "the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause patents to issue to the State of Wisconsin for the."

Amend by inserting after the word "meridian," in the seventh line, the following: "be, and the same are hereby, granted to the State of Wisconsin."

Amend by striking out the first two words in line 9 and inserting in place thereof the words "that State's."

Amend, page 2, by striking out, in lines 1, 2, and 3, the following: "alienate or attempt to alienate or use the same or any part thereof for purposes other than that for which granted."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think we would have to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 3, by striking out, after the word "the," in line 3, the following words: "Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause patents to issue to the State of Wisconsin for the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 7, by inserting, after the word "meridian," the following words: "be, and the same are hereby, granted to the State of Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 9, by striking out the words "the State" and inserting the words "that State's."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, by striking out the following: "alienate or attempt to alienate or use the same or any part thereof for purposes other than that for which granted."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in order to make the language a little more definite and certain, I offer the following amendment: In line 7, after the word "north," insert the words "of the."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, after the word "north," insert the words "of the."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin at what place it is desired to insert that amendment?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. After the word "north," in line 7, page 1. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggested that it would make it more definitely certain to add the words "of the," so that it would read "north of the."

Mr. RAKER. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, one more amendment. After the word "meridian," in line 7, insert the words "in the State of Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "meridian," in line 7, insert the words "in the State of Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I think I am perhaps responsible, from a rather hurried reading of the bill, for one of the amendments offered, I want to move, with the consent of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], to reconsider the amendment just adopted for the insertion of the words "of the," and to strike out of the bill the words "fourth principal meridian."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment consisting of the words "of the" was adopted. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. I move, Mr. Speaker, to strike out the words "fourth principal meridian."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the words "of the" to stay in?

Mr. MONDELL. No. They should be stricken out, and the words "fourth principal meridian" should be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. As the language reads, of course, it is incorrect. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is necessary to insert the range?

Mr. MONDELL. It is not necessary to insert the range, because if you say "north" of a certain township line, that is north of the township line running north through the State, and inasmuch as it is not in the bill, the provision that should apply to the range should not be in the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, the word "township" should not be used, in my judgment. It should be the word "town." The town is surveyed 6 miles square. The township is the municipal organization. There may be a town without a township. A township may include a number of towns, as is evidently the case in the part of Wisconsin to which this bill relates. So that this word should be "town" and not "township," and I think that the word "range" should be there.

Mr. MANN. But the word "range" is not there.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is not there, but it should be.

Mr. MANN. In our part of the country we use the word "township" for the Government surveys.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is not strictly proper, as I understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. All public-land surveys are by townships.

Mr. MANN. And so described in the patent.

Mr. MONDELL. And the language is correct, if the words "of the" are stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] that he withdraw his amendment containing the words "of the."

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment with the words "of the."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to do that without unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. That was reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider prevailed, and that left the amendment pending. It should either be voted upon or withdrawn.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] withdraws that amendment. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 7, by striking out the words "fourth principal meridian."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COAL LANDS ON FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION, N. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 263) to authorize allotments to Indians of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., of lands valuable for coal.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That allotments to the Indians of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, authorized by section 2 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," approved June 1, 1910, may be made of lands classified as coal lands or valuable for coal: Provided, That the coal in such lands shall be reserved and remain subject to future disposition by Congress.

With the following committee amendments:

After the word "coal," in line 12, strike out all down to and including the word "Congress," in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"with a reservation, however, in any patent which may issue upon any such allotment of the coal deposits in the lands allotted, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: Provided, That when such deposits are by Congress opened for disposition, any qualified coal claimant may enter upon these allotted lands for the purpose of prospecting for coal only after the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking given by such prospector as security for the payment of all damages occasioned by reason of such prospecting."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear a statement from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA]. It has been recommended by the department. The gentleman from North Dakota can explain the bill.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Speaker, about two years ago Congress passed a bill opening a part of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, for settlement, and it provided that where there was any coal on the land that land should neither be allotted nor be opened to settlement until Congress should otherwise provide. Allotments were given to the Indians on lands in certain parts of the reservations, and later, when the Geological Survey made a survey of the lands, they found that there was lignite coal under some of it, and particularly where the Indian allotments had been made. The Indians have agreed to take surface title to the land, with the coal underlying it reserved, and this resolution is simply to allow the allotments to be made to the Indians of the lands which they have taken as allotments and on which many are already living and where they have made improvements, with the coal reserved and subject to the future action of Congress, for such disposition of the coal as Congress may see fit.

The bill has the strong indorsement of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Indian Department.

Mr. COOPER. The resolution as originally introduced contained the following proviso:

Provided, That the coal in such lands shall be reserved and remain subject to future disposition by Congress.

What is the effect of striking that out and substituting the amendment which is proposed?

Mr. HANNA. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, in reference to that matter, that the original act for the opening of the reservation provided that both the coal and the coal lands should be reserved, but the Indians have taken their allotments on some of these lands where there is lignite coal, and the amendment which we have adopted provides that there shall be a reservation in the Indian patents of the coal deposits in the land allotted and of the right to prospect and to mine, and that this clause shall be in every patent issued to the Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit me to give him a little information, I will say that the language in the bill left the matter so that there could be no law by which any prospecting could be made on these lands preliminary to mining, and we simply adopted the language that has been used in other bills with reference to the disposition of the surface of lands, and provided that the coal should be reserved; and then provided, as the gentleman will observe, if he reads the amendment, that there may be prospecting done.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that this bill proposes to repeal the language of the former act reserving this for future disposition by Congress.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at all.

Mr. COOPER. That was the thought I had in mind, which is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, whether this amendment in any way modifies the act.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. COOPER. Are gentleman positive about it?

Mr. MANN. I am as far as I am concerned, because I went over it with the idea in view to see whether it did make any change. The coal will still be reserved. The title to the coal does not pass. Congress has control of that, and has not yet decided what shall be done with it.

Mr. COOPER. That is what I had in mind, whether it made any modification in that respect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the colon and the words "Provided, That the coal in such lands shall be reserved and remain subject to future disposition by Congress," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "with a reservation, however, in any patent which may issue upon any such allotment of the coal deposits in the lands allotted, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: Provided, That when such deposits are by Congress opened for disposition, any qualified coal claimant may enter upon these allotted lands for the purpose of prospecting for coal only after the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking given by such prospector as security for the payment of all damages occasioned by reason of such prospecting."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the amendment, after the word "allotment," in line 4, there should be inserted a comma. I move to amend by inserting the comma, as it makes a material difference.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HANNA, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CALAVERAS BIG TREE NATIONAL FOREST.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12211) to amend the act of February 18, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 626), entitled "An act to create the Calaveras Big Tree National Forest, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of February 18, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 626), entitled "An act to create the Calaveras Big Tree National Forest, and for other purposes," be amended as follows:

Omit therefrom the portion of the act beginning with the word "any" at the end of the twelfth line on page 627 thereof to and including the word "or" in the twentieth line of said page, and substitute therefor the following: "one or both of the following ways: (1) They may be given the right to file with the Secretary of the Interior, within 60 days after such conveyance, selections of surveyed, unappropriated, nonmineral public lands or of nonmineral national forest lands, and if the lands so selected shall be found subject to selection and of a value substantially equal to that of the lands conveyed they may be patented to said owners in lieu of the conveyed lands: Provided, however, That in any case where any part of the lands selected is national forest land the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture shall first be secured with respect to such part, or (2)."

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purposes of fully carrying out the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the letter "a" and insert the words "the actual."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from California whether he has concluded to do anything further about the amendments on the lines that I recently suggested to him?

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I took this matter up personally with the Secretary of the Interior and the solicitor for the Secretary of the Interior, and we discussed particularly the matter that was taken up between the gentleman from Illinois and myself. The solicitor said that it was clearly sufficient to cover the point suggested, as the bill provided for the exchange of nonmineral national forests, and that that of itself gave the authorization and was not subject to the objection that it might not be perfected because it was not a homestead, or something of that kind, but would apply to the provisions of this act and permit its provisions to be carried out.
